"Well, I will honestly tell you," answered Mrs. Troupe, "I never was so ashamed in all my life. You see Madame——, and Madame ——, and Madame Bubb, and myself, thought we would visit lady Washington, and as she was said to be so grand a lady, we thought we must put on our best bibs and bands. So we dressed ourselves in our most elegant ruffles and silks, and were introduced to her ladyship. And don't you think, we found her knitting, and with a specked (check) apron on! She received us very graciously and easily, but after the compliments were over, she resumed her knitting. There we were without a stitch of work, and sitting in state, but Gen. Washington's lady with her own hands was kniting stockings for herself and husband! And this was not all. In the afternoon her ladyship took occasion to say in a way that we could not be offended at, that at this time it was very important that American ladies should be patterns of industry to their countrywomen, because the separation from the mother country will dry up the sources whence many of our comforts have been derived. We must become independent by our determination to do without what we cannot make ourselves. Whilst our husbands and brothers are examples of patriotism, we must be patterns of industry!"

Rival Milkmen.

A Paris correspondent of the Washington Republic relates the following: "A Mr. Daurecourt, farmer and grazier in a village, of which, by the way, he is the mayor, brought an action against two of his rivals in trade, and four of his own milkwomen, for having adulterated his milk to such a degree that it was positively poisonous. Having found that his customers were deserting him, and that his butter was pronounced uneatable, he had previously caused his ponds to be cleared out, his fields to be examined, and his laborers to be repeatedly changed. A female in his employ at last confessed that she and five others had been bribed by Messrs. Chardin and Lebas, opposition milkmen and political enemies, to poison his milk, to ruin his trade, and to accomplish his social destruction. The substances mixed with his milk were sulphur, tobacco, tansy, hemlock, &c. The Tribunal of Correctional Police condemned Mr. Chardin to five years' imprisonment, Mr. Lebas to two years' imprisonment, the principal adulteratress to four years' imprisonment, and the other five to terms of durance vile varying from six months to two years. The two gentlemen were also ordered to pay $1000 damages to Mr. Daurecourt."

Postage Catechism.

Question 1. Which is the eighth commandment?

Answer. Thou shalt not steal.

Q. 2. What is forbidden in the eighth commandment?

A. That, among other things, thou shalt in no case tax thy neighbor with postage which thou thyself oughtest to pay.

Q. 3. Who are in danger of violating this prohibition?

A. All who have occasion to correspond with their fellow-men through the postoffice.

Q. 4. But does not the present cheap postage system do away this danger?

A. One might think so; but it only enhances it.

Q. 5. How does this appear?

A. Because the sum we may now thus extort from others being much less than it was formerly, the temptation to carelessness or dishonesty is proportionately greater. Many would not scruple to take, in this way, three or five cents, who would hardly venture to take twenty-five, or even ten.

Q. 6. But is not the sin proportionately less?

A. No; "He that is unjust in the least, is unjust also in much."

Q. 7. How is all danger and guilt to be avoided in this matter?

A. Very easily. First, by pre-paying every letter thou mayest send by mail. Second, by pre-paying the answer to all such as may require one.

Q. 8. How may this be done?

A. First, by keeping by thee constantly a small stock of postage stamps. Second, by pasting on the outside of thy letters one or more, according to the weight of the document; and third, by placing the same number loose inside.

Q. 9. But would not this be doing injustice to thyself whenever duty might call thee to write to thy neighbor concerning matters purely his own?

A. No; for thy neighbor is required to do the same by thee, and thus the balance of obligation would be canceled between thee and him.

Shape of Africa.

"Africa," says the learned Arnold Guyot, "is the most singular in its form of all the continents. Its mass, nearly round or ellipsoidal, is concentrated upon itself. It projects into the ocean no important peninsula, nor any where lets into its bosom the waters of the ocean. It seems to close itself against every influence from without. Thus the extension of the line of its coasts is only fourteen thousand geographical miles, of sixty to the degree, for a surface of eight millions seven hundred and twenty thousand square miles: so that Africa has only one mile of coast for six hundred and twenty-three miles of surface!"

But when we glance at the map of Europe, we perceive the very reverse to be true. "Of all the continents, Europe is the one whose forms of contour are most varied. Its principal mass is deeply cut in all parts, by the ocean, and by inland seas; and seems almost on the point of resolving itself into peninsulas." "The inland seas and the portions of the ocean which its outer limits enclose, form nearly half its surface. The line of its shores is thus carried to the extent of seventeen thousand two hundred miles, an enormous proportion, compared with its small size: for it is three thousand two hundred miles more than Africa, which is nevertheless three times greater! Europe enjoys one mile of coast for every one hundred and fifty-six square miles of surface. It is thus the continent most open to the sea for foreign connections, at the same time that it is the most individualized in local and independent districts."

A Good Garden.

No branch of husbandry is more neglected than a garden. Those farmers who live too far from market to indulge often in the luxury of fresh meat, are still content to dine on salt pork or beef, with the addition of potatoes only, rather than devote a few hours to the cultivation of a Kitchen Garden. Both health and good taste demand that a farmer's table should contain a full variety of vegetables. Radishes, lettuce, cauliflowers, beans, peas, tomatoes, beets, turnips, and indeed many others, should be found there in the proper seasons; while melons and the small fruits will furnish the breakfast and evening's board with healthful luxuries. Raspberries, strawberries, and blackberries, may be grown almost without labor, and with due attention their improvement in quality will fully compensate for the pains-taking. If farmers wish their children to be fond of home, they should at least furnish them with such luxuries as every journeyman mechanic would purchase in large cities for the use of his family, particularly when he can do so at comparatively little cost. Overland Intelligence from the Arctic Coast.

From The St. Paul's (Minnesota) Pioneer, Feb. 19.

Dr. Rae arrived at St. Paul on Saturday, the 14th inst., having performed the journey from Pembina to Sauk Rapids—some 500 miles—in ten days. It is to be observed, that voyageurs between these points are obliged to take with them from the point of starting a stock of provisions for the entire distance, and to sleep on the prairie every night. His equipage from Pembina consisted of two servants and a dog team to draw his articles of outfit. This journey was a continuance of a journey of a similar kind directly from a station of the Hudson Bay Company, on McKenzie's River, about 2,500 miles by the route of travel beyond Pembina. Both journeys were performed upon snow shoes.

Dr. Rae was sent to the Arctic Coast, in search of Franklin, last spring, by the Hudson Bay Company, at the solicitation, as we understand it, of the British authorities at home. The gentleman having won a distinguished reputation for energy and science, during eighteen years' service under the Company, was selected for this enterprise. Having obtained voyageurs from Pembina, he sailed in boats down McKenzie's River, north, and issued into the Arctic Ocean. Thence he threaded the coast easterly, 300 miles. After a fruitless search, discovering no trace of Franklin, in marks by the way, or in the knowledge of the Esquimaux, he returned just in season to escape the autumnal ice. He neither saw nor heard anything of the British and American expeditions of last year. He entertains the common conjecture, that Franklin's vessels have been crushed between floating mountains of ice. The Dr. has left for England.

A Grand Colonization Scheme.

A letter from Washington to the N. Y. Tribune, dated March 9, says: By the act of 1836, Congress directed the proceeds of the Public Lands to be deposited with the States, in four annual installments. Three installments have been deposited (distributed,) while the fourth, amounting to over nine millions of dollars, has not. A bill is being prepared, and will soon be presented by Mr. Stanly, which provides that certificates of United States 5 per cent. stock, to the amount of the fourth installment, shall be issued to the several States, as they shall be respectively entitled, upon the express condition that each State shall appropriate the interest thereof, amounting in the aggregate to over four hundred and fifty thousand dollars annually, to the transportation of free negroes within the State to Liberia, or to the education and improvement of the Liberian colonists. The principal is never to be touched without further congressional legislation, and the certificates are not to be issued to any State until the legislative authorities thereof consent to receive the same, upon the conditions above specified. If there should be, in any State, no free negroes for transportation to Liberia, then the interest money is to be appropriated in establishing schools and colleges, and in improving the moral, social, and religious condition of the citizens of the Liberian Republic.

CURING HAMS.—Messrs. Schooley & Hugh of Cincinnati, obtained the prize medal at the Great Exhibition last year, for cured hams. The Cincinnati Gazette gives the following as their process of curing. "The process is called dry salting," and of course is much more troublesome than the plan now in use. The hams are first allowed to remain in the salt a certain length of time, after which they are washed in warm water and hung separately on racks to dry, where they remain until a mouldy tinge is apparent, when, after having been carefully tried in regard to sweetness, they are ready for the smoke-house. Messers S. & H. state that the demand for their hams is greater than they can at all times supply, which is attributed to their peculiar and excellent plan of curing.

JUDICIOUS CULTIVATION.—Farmers who think that nothing can be done in their business unless the soil is cultivated by the hundred acres at least; cannot appreciate the extent to which one acre or a dozen acres can be developed. Take the experience of Mr. Cherry, of Black Rock, New York, who cultivated last season but twelve acres. He published in the Albany Cultivator that he raised:

800 bush. of corn, in ear, sold at 25c.	$200 00
750 do. potatoes at 50c.	375 00
135 1-2 do. wheat at 100c.	135 50
	$710 50

The Pilgrim's Progress has been stereotyped by the American Tract Society, in this City, in English, Welsh, Danish, German, Dutch, French, and Spanish. It has been approved for publication abroad, at the Society's expense, in the following fourteen languages: Rival Esthonian, at St. Petersburg; Armenian, at Smyrna; Arabic, at Beyroot; Nestorian, at Ooroomiah; Bengali, at Calcutta; Tamul, at Madras; Oriya, at Orissa; Hindusthani, at Lodiana; the same, in Persian character; Panjabi, or Gurmukhi, at Lodiana; Urdu, in native and in Roman letter, at Allahabad; Mahratta, at Bombay; Burmese, in Burmah; and Hawaiian, at the Sandwich Islands. The Religious Tract Society, London, in 1847, had aided to print this work in English, Dutch, French, Spanish, Portuguese, German, Esthonian, Armenian, Burmese, Singhalese, Oriya, Hindusthani, Bengali, Tamul, Mahratta, Canarese, Gujaratti, Malay, Arabic, Sumoan, Tahitian, Sichuana, and Malagasi.

VARIETY.

A novel omnibus, constructed after the model exhibited in the Chrystal Palace, has made its appearence in London. The seats are detached somewhat after the style of those in first-class railway carriages, and so contrived that the passengers sit with their faces to the horses, leaving a clear passage up the center of from 18 to 20 inches in width, and 6 feet 4 inches in hight. The passage is covered in by a semi-circular glass roof, by which means ample light is obtained. At the head of the vehicle is an alarm bell, to communicate to the driver and conductor, and accessible to all the passengers. There are also a couple of clips for newspapers, an almanac, indicator, and a lamp.

It is said that the largest building in the United States is now in process of erection at New Orleans. It is built by the Federal Government as a Custom House, and is made large enough to include the United States Court-rooms, together with the necessary warehouses for the use of the Government. The building covers some two acres of ground, and is one-third larger than the Capitol at Washington, as completed with the new wings. The granite for the building is furnished from the Quincy (Mass.) quarries. Almost all the companies at the quarries have contracts to furnish the stone. It is expected it will be about three years before the building will be entirely completed.

It is stated, in the February number of Appleton's Mechanic's Magazine, that the extent of telegraph lines in the United States and Canada exceeds 1,200 miles, involving a capital of more than three millions of dollars. To work these lines costs annually 720 tons of zinc, worth $57,000; more than a million pounds of nitric acid, worth $117,000, and $27,000 worth of mercury, besides a considerable value in sulphuric acid, &c. On the line from Pittsburgh to Cincinnati alone, there were transmitted, in the year 1850, 354,559 paid dispatches, and the revenue was $73,278.

An English paper records the invention of a new paddle-wheel on a plan for doing away with the back water caused by the paddles of steam vessels. The floats, instead of being placed longitudinally, are at right angles to the center, and at the upper end of each is a cogged wheel, working in a sliding bar passing from one side of the paddle-box to the other, and acted upon by some simple internal machinery, which, when the float has done its service in the water, gives the bar a slight lateral motion, which turns the cogged wheel, and causes the float to leave the water edgeways.

Monsieur Petin, the inventor of the new system of Æronautics, is in Boston, having recently arrived from France. He claims that he can navigate the air in any direction, by creating inclined planes at pleasure. He has a large machine suspended by ropes from three huge balloons. The body of the machine is slender timber work. To test the system fairly, a large amount of money is required, and if he can 'raise the wind,' Mons. Petin purposes to make an ascent from Boston.

The Milwaukee Advertiser says that a gentleman of that city has invented a spirit stove, which, while only a foot square, will warm any ordinary sized room. It weighs less than ten pounds, is convenient for carriages and cars, and small ones may be carried in one's pocket of a cold day, and producing neither soot, smoke, nor ashes, might be as ornamental a piece for personal wear as a watch or breastpin. It only consumes a pint of alcohol per day.

English papers record two murders which were committed by mere boys. One was at Ormskirk, where a boy twelve years old was killed with a blow of a stick given by one of his youthful companions. The other was at Sheffield, where a child four years old was killed by a school-fellow little more than five. They had quarreled about an apple, and the elder struck the other with his fist once or twice in the pit of the stomach, and caused his death.

Rev. Mr. Collins, a Methodist missionary among the Indians, brother to the missionary recently returned from China, in a letter to the Missionary Board, incidentally mentions that he has to go eighty-five miles to the post-office for his letters, and that he is living some hundreds of miles from white settlements.

Mr Ralph Steel, of Newcastle, has invented a saw capable of sawing timber into any shape for ships' use, either ship-knees or ship-timber of any description. The saw, at the same time that it is capable of cutting timber to any given shape, can also be applied to cutting straight.

Mr. George C. Todd, of Lynn, Mass., has invented a machine, for which he has secured a patent, by the aid of which shoe patterns of all sizes may be quickly and accurately drawn from a single pattern—each copy, of whatever size, being proportioned exactly like the one from which it is drawn.

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June of each year.

Board of Instruction.
Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress
Rev. J. W. MORTON, } Assistants.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, }

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—
The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term, Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00

The Sabbath Recorder.

For the Sabbath Recorder.

THE SABBATH AND THE PASSOVER.

In the articles of Mr. Begg, recently published in the Recorder, there are some views which I think erroneous. A few months after I had embraced the seventh-day Sabbath, a friend called my attention to Leviticus 23: 15, 16, to prove that the Jews changed the Sabbath every year. His argument was, that the fifteenth day of the first month (Nisan) was a Sabbath, and from it seven Sabbaths were numbered; and that as this fifteenth day of the month Nisan would from year to year occur on different days of the week, so the day of the Sabbath was changed from year to year. By a careful examination of the subject, I think I have obtained a correct understanding of the Sabbath's relation to this feast, and to this day have had no farther questions relative to such a change.

I agree with Mr. Begg concerning the type of the wave sheaf; and by this type I think it can be proved, that Christ must rise from the dead on the first day of the week. Mr. B. says, in his pamphlet, page 99:—

"There were two kinds of first fruits; both related to the Passover, and dependent upon it. The first of these was offered the day following the Passover Sabbath, at the beginning of barley harvest; the second was seven weeks thereafter, when the whole even of the wheat harvest was completed. The first consisted of a sheaf of the first ripe barley; the second, of two baked loaves. There is, we believe, much significance in this. The first represents 'Christ, the first fruits of them that slept.'"

This is as I understand it. But Mr. B. says, page 89, that "this fifteenth day was necessarily a Sabbath," and that "there is no possibility of denying" it. I admit that "this fifteenth day" was a Sabbath, but I question whether it was such independent of the weekly Sabbath. The fifteenth day of the first month will occasionally fall on the weekly Sabbath; and such, I have no doubt, was the case at the time of the crucifixion.

On page 89, Mr. B. says, "It is therefore necessary thus to insist upon the fact that these holy convocation days were as truly Sabbaths as those of weekly recurrence." But why say necessary? Why not bring a "thus saith the Lord?"

"And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, concerning the feasts of the Lord, which ye shall proclaim to be holy convocations, even these are my feasts. Six days shall work be done; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of rest, an holy convocation; ye shall do no work therein; it is the Sabbath of the Lord in all your dwellings. These are the feasts of the Lord, even holy convocations, which ye shall proclaim in their seasons. In the fourteenth day of the first month at even is the Lord's passover. And on the fifteenth day of the same month is the feast of unleavened bread unto the Lord. Seven days ye must eat unleavened bread. In the first day ye shall have an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work therein. In the seventh day is an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work therein." Leviticus 23, 1—8.

Here, then, are two "convocation days," the fifteenth and the twenty-first, and also one weekly Sabbath, included in this "feast of seven days." But God did not say to Moses, Tell the children of Israel that these "convocation days" are "Sabbaths." He distinctly names "the Sabbath" first, and He has so ordered this feast, that it "necessarily" includes one weekly Sabbath, and only one. According to Mr. B.'s argument, I think he cannot escape the conclusion of my friend, however absurd, viz. that "the weekly Sabbath was changed every year." For the first month (and consequently all the rest) is governed by the ripening harvest and the moon; therefore the passover could not fall on the same day of the week every year, or even two years successively. Tradition, it is true, presents us with some very plausible justification of Mr. B.'s opinions; but I cannot allow tradition to supplant the Word of God; and as God has not called either the first or the seventh day of the feast of unleavened bread "Sabbath," I do not believe that it is right to call them so. Furthermore, if they are "Sabbaths," God has not designated from which to number the fifty days spoken of in verse 16, and the Israelites would be left to make their own selection, which does not accord with the particular manner in which God by Moses specifies all the transactions of His feasts.

The feast of the wave loaves will, I think, help in making God's intention more plain. Here are "seven Sabbaths." Are they weekly Sabbaths? Why has Mr. B. so often reiterated that the feast "Sabbath" was "not the weekly Sabbath," and yet omitted to notice these "seven Sabbaths," although he has quoted them himself? Page 98. Lest a mistake might occur in numbering seven Sabbaths, "days" are commanded—fifty days, to "the morrow after the seventh Sabbath." And this fiftieth day is also a holy convocation day, and would, according to Mr. B.'s argument, be a Sabbath after the seventh Sabbath; for, if the first day of the feast "necessarily" be a Sabbath, then the same necessity attaches to the seventh day of the feast, and also to the morrow after the seventh Sabbath." Now, as the passover does not fall on the same day of the week every year, so fifty days from the second day of the passover must necessarily be subject to the same change of day—a hypothesis which, I think, is not sustained by the Word of God.

I have no fear that any advantage can be taken from God's regulation of the Passover feast, as giving a license to change the Sabbath in any wise; and so far as I can see, from comparing scripture with scripture, the evidence is fairly in favor of the weekly Sabbath, which is included in the feast of unleavened bread, being the feast Sabbath, and the one from which the seven following Sabbaths must numbered. The harmony of these two connected feasts, the seven Sabbaths, and the fifty days, requires that it should be so. Thus the wave sheaf would always be presented on the first day of the week, "the morrow after the Sabbath," and the "wave loaves," fifty days after, would also be presented on the same corresponding day, "the morrow after the seventh Sabbath."

I view this subject as of some importance, because a correct understanding of it will, I think, help much in clearing away some of the difficulties that occur in the New Testament in connection with Christ's resurrection. If, however, as Mr. B. intimates, the convocation days are Sabbaths because "no servile work" shall be done in them, or because they are called high days, still some explanation is necessary regarding the seven intervening Sabbaths. Nothing is said in relation to any change to accommodate those seven; and occasionally these "convocation days" must necessarily fall on the weekly Sabbath. This month (Nisan) being the first, or beginning of the year, leads also to the reflection, that God has hereby intimated that the closing scenes of the six thousand years will occur at this season, when the whole Israel of God will be delivered from the bondage of sin and corruption. The first day of the week corresponds also with the first day of the creation; and as all God's works are complete and perfect, we may reasonably conclude, that the great Sabbath, the rest that remains for the people of God, will commence at this same time. God give us grace to live in readiness for it.

A CHINAMAN ON THE ENGLISH.

[Copied for the North China Herald from an unpublished work entitled, "Fugitive Notes on England and the English; taken by a Chinaman, after a visit to Great Britain, in the years 1844, '45, '46."]

The Queen—The Women—The Men—Merchants—Society—Meals—Miscellaneous.

The faces of the fair sex (for shading which they wear gauze veils of the finest texture) are as delicate as the hibiscus flower; and as I have watched them sitting side by side in the same carriage, I could not help remarking, how like the sweet violet they looked. Their eyes, having the blue tint of the waters of autumn, are charming beyond description; and their waists are squeezed as tight and thin as a willow branch. What perhaps caught my fancy most, was the sight of elegantly-dressed young ladies, with pearl white necks, and tight-laced waists. Nothing can possibly be so enchanting as to see ladies that compress themselves into taper-forms of the most exquisite shape, the like of which I have never seen before. In their splendid carriages, (which are generally drawn by a pair of horses, each with a diamond spot of white hair upon its snout,) ladies and gentlemen sit together; but as for the ladies who grace these carriages, their beauteous hue surpasses the bloom of the spring flowers—their eye-brows are of a delicate outline, resembling that of hills looming in the distant horizon—the color of their eyes is of the most charming blue—and their whole deportment is as calm and cool as the autumnal waters.

The elegant dresses they wear are often made of watered silk, that looks like a collection of fibres from some cerrus-cloud. In the cold weather they are in the habit of putting variegated fur tippets and boas around the neck. Tortoise-shell combs are used for keeping up the hair, both on the back and on the side of the head. Their caps are decked with artificial flowers; their bonnets carry plumes of brilliant flowers; and caps and bonnets alike are trimmed with beautiful silk ribbons. When they go out for a walk, fine silken bags dangle from their arms, coral chains with gold watches are slung about the neck, they carry open parasols of the shape of the full moon, their robes are gay as the rainbow, and as they pass and repass you while you stand at your door, the pretty sounds of their tittering and talking remind you of the sweet notes of the thrush.

As to the men, they have prominent noses, bushy eye-brows, and frizzly hair. They spare no pains in washing, dressing, and adorning their persons. Their under-garments are tight; their outer, short, and open in front. The sleeves of their coats are worn tight, to keep out the cold. As perspiration is very much disliked, scented oils, or waters, are much used, some of which (for deliciousness of flavor) can vie with what is of the highest repute among us under the name of "the Dragon's Saliva!" They carry beautiful pieces of gold and silver money in elegant purses. Their hats are of beaver, their shoes of leather, and their clothes of fine black cloth.

The British are an enterprising people. Most of their merchants are men of large capital, and being fearless of danger, as well as regardless of distance, they travel far off upon the sea to the remotest regions, to open marts for their commerce.

Great Britain has been, for nearly eighteen centuries under the influence of Christianity, to which, chiefly, I think, must be attributed the refinement in customs and manners of the nation. Of the idle tales and silly vagaries of the Buddhist and Taouist religions, they know nothing, because they derive all their principles of true morality from its true source—the Supreme Being. They do not even offer sacrifices to the manes of their departed ancestors; but the whole nation are to a man worshipers of the God of Heaven. Him they adore with all sincerity of heart. Hence their intercourse in society is marked by pure integrity and unmixed kindness. The worship of God they observe in their families. Thus, for instance, in the morning the entire household meet to unbosom their hearts, thoughts, and affections, in solemn worship and prayer to the God of all. In this act, too, their love to the human race shines forth very remarkably, inasmuch as, during this service also, they earnestly desire that good will and benevolence may extend throughout the whole world. In praying, they do not pray that they themselves may obtain any selfish ends, such as fame or gain. Bearing in mind that the instructions of the ancient sages should be observed, they suffer no low and selfish thought at such a time to disturb their minds; but, having finished perusing a portion of God's Holy Word, they all together prostrate themselves before Him and implore, with all fervor, that the gospel may spread far and wide, until it shall reach every spot on this habitable globe. For the public worship of God, they have chapels or churches, to each of which a minister is appointed, who conducts the services and preaches to the congregations. Nor are their preachers of the gospel reluctant to go to the most forbidding wilds of foreign countries, if they can but fulfil the objects of their sacred calling in those places.

Among charitable institutions, the English support Medical Dispensaries and Public Hospitals, where they cure lingering diseases, without the use of those tedious and ineffective prescriptions that are in vogue among the people of this Middle Kingdom.

The English seem to delight in the golden rule—"Love thy neighbor as thyself;" and in carrying out the spirit of this maxim, I do not think there is any farce or hypocrisy with them. As far as came under my observation, the feelings of the people are generous and benevolent, their manners perfectly refined, and their usual deportment, while it is kind and bland, bespeaks the deepest sincerity.

Hosts and guests are exceedingly polite to each other, and, both in meeting and parting, heartily shake hands; while relations, in token of deep affection, exchange the kiss of friendship. When strangers meet, the intercourse is most respectful, and the conversation free from rude speeches. Sometimes, as a mark of attention, they may treat you to a glass of wine, sometimes a cup of tea. The writer of these notes, although a visitor from a distant country, and a man of no merit whatever, was nevertheless entertained with great hospitality, every where met with much respect, and, no matter into what company he went, eager inquiries were put to him regarding China and her customs. Many a gay lady has made tea for the China stranger, and often, often, have young maidens brought their albums to him that he might write a line or two of Chinese for them.

In their social intercourse, respect for the female sex is one feature that I could not help observing as being very prominent, and most likely inherited by them from antiquity. Their young children are well educated and well behaved, and the sweetest harmony prevails in the family circle; so that, whenever its members group around the firside, there is no squabbling, no wrangling, but all is order, quiet, peace.

When they take their meals, the whole family sit at one and the same table. The breakfast is served in an elegant service of plate and porcelain. When the dinner hour arrives, (the lateness of which depends on the rank of the guest,) each lady, leaning on the arm of a gentleman, is conducted to the dining room. The festive board is decorated with flowers of the most exquisite hue, and fruits of every variety. Spoons, instead of chopsticks, are set out to eat rice with—rice as white as snow. Their table-knives glitter like the hoar-frost, and have edges sharp enough to mince the toughest meat. When the dishes have all been laid out, and before even a spoon or knife is touched, thanks are first offered up to the Ruler of all for the bounties of His Providence. Soup in a tureen is generally the first dish; after which the several standard dishes come in succession. Instead of rice being, as with us, their staple food, they take beef and mutton, (cooked not with firewood, but with coal.) Ask for what spice you like to stimulate your appetite with, and it is at once handed you. Various wines too, (the fine product of the grape,) the sweet flavor of which fills the banquet room, are served out in abundance.

At their evening parties, as I have watched the most delicious tea made in silver tea-pots, and the silver tray go round the room laden with snow-white sugar, rich cream, sweet cakes, and pearly butter, I could not lose sight of the ladies before me. They looked like fairies of the most lovely figure, flitting and gliding along before my eyes. And yet these were not airy phantoms, or cloud-wrapped nymphs, created by some magic art. They were living realities; and one cup of tea, under auspices so propitious, was enough to drive dull care away!

The usual hour for getting up in the morning is five o'clock, and for going to bed at night, eleven. When they want to call a servant, they ring a bell. The attendant is waiting outside, and, on hearing the call, quietly walks in. At weddings, the reigning color is white; at funerals, black. In using the door-knocker, there seems to be something like the following rule: A lady taps gently; a gentleman gives a decided and repeated knock; the postman makes two loud-rapped strokes; a servant only one. When a visitor comes to pay a call, it is customary to send up a neat card with his name upon it. As soon as he crosses the threshold of the house-door, he takes off his hat. You will almost invariably find that each gentleman, in taking his walks abroad, carries his cane or stick with him; you will not often see a servant boy following behind, but more frequently a dog, or perhaps a pet cur, with a bell round his neck. Ladies and gentlemen, when they walk out together, generally walk arm in arm. Go out at what hour you choose, and you may, if you like, mount some finely equipped coach; or, if you are about to take a jaunt into the country, the coach-guard blows his horn to warn you of the hour for starting. In lodging any money at a banker's office, you receive a note or bill to the amount thereof. The gray-goose quill is used for writing the running hand, and when a letter is written and folded, it is sealed with wax. For his leisure moments, each one has at hand what suits his taste, a musical instrument or a book. The ladies at such times are great readers, or while their spare moments away in working embroidery with a pretty, delicate needle. The gentlemen are fond of amusing themselves at cricket, which is played either out of town or on a fine lawn, and is really well worth looking at.

In conclusion, now, reader, amidst all the wonders, attentions, and enjoyments which I found among the English people, what think you was it that mortified me? It was, that I was not able to speak one word of their language. A consciousness of this defect greatly annoyed me at the time, and the reminiscence thereof still makes me feel no little shame.

STOLEN SERMONS.

The history of preaching in Europe and America would contain a very curious chapter relating to what have been really, or in reputation, stolen compositions delivered from the pulpit. Two or three cases of this kind now occur to our recollection.

Some twenty years ago, there lived at Bristol, Eng., a very able and popular preacher—the Rev. William Thorpe. Commanding in person and manner, with a voice blending the peal of the thunder with the softness of the zephyr, and with a pathos and unction, which in his best seasons were almost unrivaled, he was every where popular. No man, when he brought out his powers, could make a better sermon; but he was naturally indolent, and having a most extraordinary memory, he never made a secret of the fact that not a few of his sermons were composed by others. The practice placed him, sometimes, in an awkward position, which, however, he occasionally turned to good account. His week evening sermons were generally extempore, and cost him but half an hour's thought in his vestry, which he usually reached so long before the commencement of the service. One Wednesday evening, on his arrival at church, he found on the table some fifty copies of a printed sermon, sent by a poor neighboring minister for sale. Thorpe sat down, read and admired the sermon, and then went into the pulpit and delivered it. His hearers were delighted, and went almost in crowds into the vestry to express their gratification. The worthy pastor, wishing perhaps to test the sincerity of these compliments, and no doubt desiring to benefit his neighboring brother, said to his people, "O yes, the sermon you have heard to-night was a good sermon, a very good sermon; but do not thank me for it, it is none of mine; there it lies printed on the table, pay your shillings, and take home the copies, and so refresh your memories, and send a few loaves of bread to the family of its author." We need not add, the sermons were all sold.

When Mr. Thorpe was settled in London, before he removed to Bristol, he preached from memory the whole six volumes of Saurin's sermons, on successive Sabbath evenings. When he had reached the end, the late Samuel Bagster, the Biblical publisher, a personal friend of Thorpe sent him a handsomely bound copy of Saurin, with a note kindly hoping that his friend would accept a copy of Saurin, as he thought the old copy must be worn out. Thorpe most pleasantly accepted the present, and told Bagster that he hoped he had been greatly profited by the labors of the best preacher which France had ever produced.

There lived in Thrope's days, and we hope yet lives, in a city ten or twelve miles from Bristol, one of the most popular preachers of the day. He and Thorpe had been engaged to preach on occasion of the dedication of a new church, and traveled a great part of the journey on the day preceding together. On the way, Thorpe acknowledged that he had made no preparation for the service, and indeed was not even provided with a text. For this his companion severely blamed him, little thinking of what the result was to be. Arrived at the end of their journey, they were put to sleep in a double-bedded room. In the night J——, who was at that time exceedingly careful of his delivery, awoke, and supposing Thorpe to be asleep, he carefully repeated aloud the sermon he had to deliver in the morning. Thrope lay and heard it, admired it, and formed his plans respecting it. When they arose, he entreated J—— to exchange services with him, chiefly pleading that he did not feel quite comfortable at the idea of following the finished sermon that, no doubt, J—— would deliver in the morning, besides which, by far the largest congregation would be in attendance in the evening. The bait took; J——, the unsuspecting J——, gave up, and when he went to church it was to listen to his own sermon, prepared with so much care for the evening! And what added to his mortification was, that whenever Thorpe had delivered one of the finest passages, he would pause for a moment to look into J——'s face to see how it took!

This was by no means the only sermon of J——'s that has been stolen from him; indeed, we have heard him say, that in traveling he has sometimes gone into a strange church, and had an opportunity of listening to a stranger of another denomination, delivering and sometimes murdering, one of his own printed sermons; and once introduced himself to one of these preaching thieves to reprove him for the manner in which he had spoiled his sermon.

On one occasion a living minister heard J—— in London, when he delivered a plain, practical sermon, which could not well be got rid of by any one that heard it. As the minister arrived at his home very late in the week, and had not time to prepare two sermons for the Sabbath, he delivered in the evening, entirely from memory, substantially the same sermon he had heard from J——. On going his round among his friends on the Monday morning, he found his people in a state of excitement such as he had never witnessed before. Every one contended that he had been personal, and every man contended that the preacher meant him. The pastor got through for the time as quietly as he could, suspecting how the matter would end. In a few days his church met on their general business, and the pastor took an opportunity of stating the whole of the facts, and laid on the table a printed copy of the sermon as delivered by J——, "reported for the Pulpit," a London publication devoted to sermons.

One fact more, and we will relieve the attention of the reader. It relates to J—— himself. One Lord's day he was absent from his pulpit, which was occupied by a young man with whom he had recently become acquainted, and who had delivered a sermon which had greatly charmed him. In the evening of the day, the young supply delivered the sermon he had, before preached in the presence of their pastor. The people did not conceal their displeasure that he had stolen a sermon from their pastor, who had preached it to them verbatim only on the preceding Lord's day evening. The young minister asserted his innocence, but no one believed him. He did not feel himself at liberty to state the facts of the case, but determined not to leave the city till Mr. J—— returned, and some explanation could be given. On the following Lord's day he adverted in his pulpit to the circumstance of the sermon from the same pulpit on two successive Sabbath evenings, and added, very significantly, "It is quite true there was stealing in the case; but my friend did not steal it from me, but I stole it from him. I heard him preach it; it did me good; I thought it exactly adapted for you, and so I preached it; my brother thought that you needed it, and gave it to you again. If blame rests any where, it is with your pastor, and not with your visitor."

THE MOST EFFICIENT MISSIONARIES.

BY MRS. EMILY C. JUDSON.

Among the various opinions which prevail with regard to the qualifications most desirable in a missionary, care must be taken that the "tithe of mint, and anise, and cummin," do not occupy too prominent a position, to the detriment of the "weightier matters of the law." Devotion to Christ and love to man are, after all, the great qualifications.

Some seven or eight years ago, there came to Maulmain a fine old British officer, who had, in the dawn of his career, served in the Peninsular wars, and brought away a French love-token, in the shape of an honorable scar, from the battle of Salamanca. He was an earnest, active, fearless sort of a man, and yet not particularly gifted with any thing except the life-giving influences of the Holy Spirit. In his regiment he was a sort of dissenting chaplain; in the little English church he was the first in every good word and work; and in the prison and hospital he was like a ministering angel, until forbidden by his superior to degrade his office by familiar intercourse with the common soldiers; and then he submissively took his stand in the doorway, and read and preached the gospel to the sick and the friendless within. Thus much for his own countrymen—but that was not all. His association with the American missionaries opened a new field of usefulness, and in spite of jeers, reproaches, and expostulations, he entered upon it manfully. By the help of a Burmese Christian, who had been taught the English, he went up the street and down, preaching the gospel to all he met, and distributing tracts from the ample satchel of his interpreter. He also stood in the zayat by the wayside, assailing every passer-by; he entered the lowly doors of the lowliest natives; and in the monasteries he boldly opposed his own commission to the lofty pretensions of the proud proprietors of the shaven crown and yellow robe.

Now, that is the sort of man, whatever his other qualifications may be, most needed in the great missionary work.

EARNEST PRAYER ANSWERED.

It was on a very cold evening, some years since, when a number of young men and women started for the neighboring village of ——, in one of the Middle States, on a sleighing party, in high glee for the dance and entertainment. A mother sat sad by the hearth, as her beloved daughter and sons jumped with joyous step into the sleigh, and soon the sound of the whip and bells were no longer heard in the distance. She proposed to their father (who was looked upon as a patriarch in Israel) to put the horse to the sleigh, and to go to her brother's house, and spend the evening in united prayer with his wife and himself for their children. He denied her not, but took her there at great risk of their lives, between one and two miles, through the deep snow-drifts. The evening was spent in prayer and supplication, and this devoted couple returned again to their home, at a late hour of the night. A few months after this, their prayers were fully answered, even beyond their highest expectations; nearly every member of these two families became the subjects of Divine grace. It was the commencement of a powerful revival of religion in that region of country.

These fathers and mothers have gone home to receive the blessed plaudit, "Well done, faithful servants, inherit the kingdom which is prepared for you;" but their children are still living, a number of whom are in the ministry, the others elders in churches or consistent members of the church. What does this lesson teach parents? Be in earnest—ask—wrestle, as did these Christian parents, and ye shall prevail! [N. Y. Observer.

THE HUSBANDMAN.

Earth, of man the bounteous mother,
  Feeds him still with corn and wine;
He who best would aid a brother,
  Shares with him these gifts divine.

Many a power within her bosom,
  Noiseless, hidden, works beneath;
Hence are seed, and leaf, and blossom,
  Golden ear and clustered wreath.

These to swell in strength and beauty,
  Is the royal task of man;
Man's a king, his throne is duty,
  Since his work on earth began.

Bud and harvest, bloom and vintage,
  These, like man, are fruits of earth;
Stamped in clay, a heavenly mintage,
  All from dust receive their birth.

Barn and mill, and wine-vat's treasures,
  Earthly goods for earthly lives,
These are nature's ancient pleasures,
  These her child from her derives.

What the dream, but vain rebelling,
  If from earth we sought to flee?
'Tis our stored and ample dwelling,
  'Tis from it the skies we see.

Wind and frost, and hour and season,
  Land and water, sun and shade,
Work with these, as bids thy reason,
  For thy work thy toil to aid.

Sow thy seed, and reap in gladness!
  Man himself is all a seed;
Hope and hardship, joy and sadness,
  Show the plant to ripeness lead. [Stirling.

IDOLATRY IN CHINA.

The god of wealth is worshiped throughout China; and when we recollect that "covetousness is idolatry," we fear that multitudes in our own country fall under the same condemnation. Mr. Loomis says: "There is a god of cooks, found in the kitchen;" and he speaks of "a god of the threshold." There are gods of the land and grain, worshiped by farmers; and "the god of the earth" is worshiped by all. So numerous are the idol gods of China, that one work, which purports to give a complete history of them, makes twenty-two volumes, 8 vo! An uncouth, imaginary being, called Lung, or the Dragon, is supposed to have great influence, and is generally worshiped. The sun and the moon are gods also, though they have few altars or temples. When an eclipse is about to take place, "the air resounds with the cries of women and children, the clangor of gongs and brazen vessels, and the report of fire-arms and powder-crackers." Great consternation seizes all classes of people. Mr. Loomis describes the scene of such an occurrence: "I was sitting in my study at the time it commenced, and not anticipating the event, was aroused, and, I will acknowledge, also a little alarmed, at the sudden bursting forth of all the horrid noises described above; and I can testify that, together with the lurid light of the partially obscured sun, it was sufficiently terrifying. But we were soon needed in the school-room, and we found there a strange scene of confusion, boisterous lamentation, with quaking and pale affright. One poor little girl did not recover from her alarm during the whole day. They were taken out to view the sun, while the moon was passing over its disk, with the help of smoked glass, and the phenomenon was explained to them." [N. Y. Observer.

A HINDOO LETTER.

In external appearance and construction of expressions, a Hindoo letter is worthy of notice. It is written on a palm leaf, with an iron stile, four to six inches long, and sharp pointed at the end. In writing neither chair nor table is needed, the leaf being supported on the middle finger of the left hand, and kept steady with the thumb and forefinger. The right hand does not, as with us, move along the surface, but after finishing a few words, the writer fixes the point of the iron in the last letter, and pushes the leaf from right to left, so that he may finish his line. This becomes so easy by long practice, that one often sees a Hindoo writing as he walks the street. As this species of penmanship is but a kind of faint engraving, the strokes of which are indistinct, they make the character legible by besmearing the leaf with an ink-like fluid. A letter is generally finished on a single leaf, which is then enveloped in a second, whereon is written the address. In communicating the decease of a relative the custom is to singe the point of the leaf upon which the afflicting news is written. When a superior writes to an inferior, he puts his own name before that of the person to whom he writes, and the reverse when he writes to a superior.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, March 25, 1852.

THE CORRUPTION OF MAN'S NATURE NO EXCUSE FOR SIN.

From the time of the first transgression, it has been the practice of man to charge the blame of his evil doings upon some one besides himself. Accused of a particular fault, he attempts to justify himself from the circumstances in which he was placed at the time of committing it; or, if no better apology offers, he finds one in the native corruption of his heart, for which (as he supposes) he is no more responsible than he is for the color of his skin, or the shape of his leg. He talks as if his depraved disposition were chargeable to God, and, in no sense, chargeable to himself; and of the indulgence of a vicious appetite, he speaks as if it were as necessary as it is for a thirsty man to drink, or for a hungry person to eat. In short, he regards himself as the subject of misfortune rather than of guilt, and therefore easily persuades himself, that it would be unjust in God to sentence him to any greater punishment than the afflictions which inevitably attend his unfortunate condition in this world.

For argument's sake, let it be granted, that man is not responsible for the original corruption of his nature. Does that excuse him? What though, by reason of his corruption, he is turned away from God, and his whole inward being is determined to self, as an ultimate end of living? Does that compel him to specific forms of transgression? Because he has no disposition to seek God's glory, must he therefore commit murder? Because he cannot find it in his heart to delight in God, must he therefore debauch his neighbor's wife? Certainly, for such specific forms of sin the original corruption of the heart constitutes no excuse. It might as well be pretended, that, because a piece of ground is unfitted for the production of wholesome fruits, the owner may use it for the cultivation of what tends only to pestilence and death.

If sinners, instead of speculating upon their original corruption, for the purpose of finding in it some excuse for their wickedness, would seriously inquire whether there is not some remedy for it, they would act much more rationally. When a man finds himself in an undesirable situation, his first aim, always, is to extricate himself from it. How he became involved in it, or whether his being involved in it constitutes any justification for certain practices which have grown out of it, is not the main question with him. Even if he should, upon the most careful review, find that he was not at all to blame, the very fact that it is an undesirable situation, rouses all his energies to the work of delivering himself. The poor slave is involved in his degradation by no fault of his own; but is he therefore contented to remain in slavery? The chance of escape being afforded, he seizes it with avidity. And since it is the universal practice of man to seek deliverance from any condition which renders him uneasy, we may safely conclude that sinners are not sincere when, instead of inquiring after a remedy for their corruption, they seek to make it an apology for their wickedness. Their great guilt consists in resting satisfied with such corruption.

If Adam entailed corruption upon his posterity, the act on his part was sinful, and God will hold him responsible for it. But if you, a child of Adam, give evidence by every voluntary act, that you are well satisfied to have it entailed upon you, then God holds you responsible. The legacy is one which you willingly accept. Thus far, not a single act, on your part, has given proof of any disposition to reject it. You never will, you never can, furnish such proof by any act except faith in the second Adam, the Lord from heaven; for it is in him only that the remedy for man's corruption is found.

There is no doubt, that sinners are well satisfied with that depraved disposition which is theirs by reason of their connection with the first Adam. It is their predominant disposition; and as two predominant dispositions cannot exist in the same person at the same time, whatever dissatisfaction they may think they feel, on some fitful occasions, amounts to nothing. Indeed, apart from the influence of divine grace, it is doubtful whether they ever feel any disquiet on account of their depravity itself, though they may occasionally be smitten with remorse, in view of the ascendancy which some particular form of transgression has gained over them. As they are well satisfied to accept the legacy entailed upon them by the first transgressor, they are quite as guilty as if they had, each one of them separately, been placed in Adam's circumstances, and from that state of uprightness fell by their own act. T. B. B.

Revivals in Seventh-day Baptist Churches.—We have had the pleasure recently of announcing interesting revivals of religion in several Seventh-day Baptist Churches. There are several others from which we have good news. The church at Adams, N. Y., has enjoyed a pleasant season during the winter, under the labors of Eld. Alfred B. Burdick, of Westerly, R. I. The number of baptisms we do not now remember. Eld. Hiram P. Burdick writes us that the Church in Hartsville, Allegany Co., N. Y., has been blessed with a revival, in the progress of which forty have been hopefully converted. Eighteen had been baptized and united with the Hartsville church at the time of his writing, on the 12th inst. Others were expected soon to follow Christ in this ordinance.

THE "FOREKNOWLEDGE" DISCUSSION.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

From the Recorder of March 18th, I am given to understand that the space occupied by me in its columns is more than properly belongs to me, and perhaps could be better employed. I presume that such is the fact. And although there are some important points, suggested in the last two articles of Bro. Brown, which seem to require attention, yet I would rather they would pass unreplied to, than to hold the readers of the Recorder by the button in order to induce them to hear what I have to say. I hope to be able, in the future, to abstain from any ungenerous demand for space in the columns of the Recorder, or upon the attention of its readers. For whatever may have been said during the course of the discussion thus far, inconsistent with the rules of debate and Christian courtesy, I earnestly ask pardon. N. V. Hull.

Alfred Center, March 18, 1852.

Remarks.

We certainly had no intention to shut the door against our brother. All we intended was to bring the controversy within such limits as would be regarded by our readers as not an unreasonable tax upon their patience. We are satisfied, that the majority of them have no taste for metaphysical discussions; and from intimations repeatedly given from different sources, it was apparent, that we were regarded as being engaged in unprofitable speculations. The writer of these remarks is, himself, of a different mind altogether, and would be glad to have the subject agitated among our people, till it was thoroughly understood. Of course, he cannot make others view the subject as he does. But we say again, that if our brother feels that justice has not been done him, or that the cause of truth requires some farther elucidation of his views, the door is open. Only be as concise, and pointed, as possible. T. B. B.

THE WANT OF MINISTERS.

Scarcely a week passes that we are not asked where an unemployed Seventh-day Baptist minister can be found to supply some destitute church. This circumstance has led us anxiously to consider the present condition of our churches with respect to ministerial aid, and also the location and occupation of those who have been ordained to the ministry among us. The result is far from encouraging.

There are now sixty-eight churches connected with our six Associations, and three which are not so connected. In these churches, sixty-one ordained ministers and sixteen licentiates hold their membership. The licentiates are for the most part engaged in secular occupations, and have no intention of immediately going forward to ordination. Of the ordained ministers, perhaps twenty are giving themselves principally to the work of the ministry; while the remainder are combining ministerial labor with labor on the farm, in the work-shop, or in the school-room—a combination which, in nine cases out of ten, proves fatal to extensive ministerial usefulness. Now, when destitute churches begin to look about for ministers to supply them, they do not, on the one hand, want to call ministers who are already usefully employed; nor do they, on the other hand, want to call men who have become involved and tied up to their present location by the purchase of houses and lands, or other facilities for the transaction of secular business and the making of money. Hence there is great difficulty in securing supplies, and the want of ministers is every where felt.

This state of things is acknowledged by all to be bad—very bad. It is bad for the churches to be unable to supply themselves with acceptable preachers; and it is bad for the preachers to be (or to feel that they are) under the necessity of pursuing some secular business to earn bread for themselves and their families, while the gospel field around them is white already for the harvest, and laborers are manifestly needed. But this state of things is likely to continue until there is a radical change some where. Either the churches must come up to their duty in giving adequate support to the ministry; or, the ministry must resolve to toil on in the Master's vineyard unsupported; or, things must go on after the present miserable rate. Which of these will we choose? To go on at the present rate is almost certain death. To expect the ministry to toil faithfully and constantly in their spiritual calling while no provision is made for their temporal support, is unreasonable. For the churches to do their part in supporting the ministry, is their most reasonable duty, as it is their best policy, and should be their highest pleasure.

Sometimes, in talking with the apologists for penurious churches, we have heard the blame of the existing state of things charged upon the ministers. If the ministers would only persevere, we are told, the churches would sooner or later come up to the work; but their want of perseverance leads to the sad results we now see. No doubt some blame attaches to the ministers in this respect. Very few men like to plead for themselves in such a case, or even to insist upon the practical application of those texts of Scripture which require the church to supply with carnal things those who minister to them in spiritual things. At the same time, we must be permitted to express the opinion, that the church is most likely to be in fault here. When a man really feels that he is called of God to preach the gospel, and commits himself before the world by going about that work, he is not very likely to draw back from it, if properly encouraged. His standing in community and his pride of consistency, combine with his sense of duty to urge him forward. And it is difficult for us to conceive of such an one abandoning his position on the score of inadequate support, when in fact there has been no such inadequacy as to involve the church in blame. We wish, at any rate, that the churches could be induced to do what most of them admit to be their duty, and then let us see if two-thirds of the ministers will prefer secular business to the glorious work to which they profess to have been called.

—But we took up our pen to introduce an extract from an article by a correspondent of the Southern Presbyterian. After referring to two things which he had lately seen in that paper; one an advertisement of a minister of the Gospel, who wished a situation as teacher, in a place where he might also be useful as a minister; the other a statement that of 70 Presbyterian ministers in Georgia, "only seven receive an adequate support;" he says:

"Want of Ministers!" We hear the same cry from north, south, east and west. But who wants them? The Church. And what will she do with them? Fill up vacancies, and send them out into that "Great West" of which we hear so much, is the reply. But here is a good brother advertising for a school. Now, if we are not sadly mistaken, he has not told us his real want. Certainly he does not think of teaching for health, or pleasure, or the trial of his patience. A living is doubtless what he wants, and he is seeking a school only as a means for attaining this object. Now, if this should be the case, why not take him, and others who have been looking for similar situations, whose souls yearn to preach Christ, and place them where they may preach, and feed them, and feed their families, and let their sons grow up under all the sacred influences of the ministry, by the blessing of God, to become ministers themselves, instead of imbibing a disgust for the holy office from the very meanness which is often thrown around it?

But we will now suppose that the Concert of Prayer is over, and all the churches, especially those which are not suppoiting their ministers, have been "with one accord in one place," praying the Lord of the harvest that He would send forth laborers into His harvest. What a delightful time you have had! How did your hearts burn within you! Surely a blessing is near. So much unity of feeling, so much fervor of spirit, indicate that glorious events are at hand. And lo! here it comes. Just what we expected from such a meeting. And now, as in former years, out goes a report that sends a thrill of joy through many a heart, and causes even the angels to strike a new and loftier note of praise. "Ten young men have been hopefully converted, and are turning their attention to the ministry." Glorious tidings! All intending to devote themselves to the service of the church! But now let us see what she will do with them. We put the question directly, What will you do with them? You churches who have prayed for them, and who have it in your power now to say whether or not they shall devote their energies to the cultivation of this great moral vineyard—what will you do with them? Do you hesitate? Stand aside, and let the past answer. We will take nine of them and place them on farms, in school-houses, or send them out on agencies as we have an opportunity, and let them work hard for a living six days in the week, and then do the best they can for the Lord on the seventh. For the other one we will contrive some plan to get a support. And is it thus, oh! men—Christian men, that you deal with Christ's servants? They are His, and according to your own request He has sent them to you—sent them with messages of peace, of love to your families. And now when they come—come, as you acknowledge, at his own command, will you take them the moment they begin to preach, and tie a mill-stone of cares about their necks, and cast them into the great sea of trouble, to "sink or swim, live or die," as best they can? What then, we ask again, will you do with them, with those young men who are now in a course of preparation for the ministry, whom God converted in answer to your prayers last year and the year before; who will soon say to you, "Here are we, send us"? Will you treat them in the same manner? Beware! there may be danger in your path. God loves His church; He watches over His ministers. So then, and when the Concert of Prayer arrives, think of these things. It will do you no harm; it may do you good. And when you pray for men, consecrate the means for their support. Let your prayers and your alms come up together before God, and the days of your mourning for the "want of ministers" will soon cease.

Missions in Caffreland.—The missions among the Caffres have suffered sadly from the war now in progress. Mr. Read, a missionary at Kat River, who had been prosecuting his work for more than fifty years, was compelled to witness the burning of all his buildings, and the destruction of all his property. Mr. Read gives a mournful list of the various mission stations which have been abandoned, and for the most part entirely destroyed. The list comprises six principal stations, belonging to the London Missionary Society, viz:—

1. Philipton, with its thirteen out-stations. 2. Tidmanton. 3. Freemanton. 4. Theopolis. 5. Peelton. 6. Knapp's Hope.

Evil Tokens in France.—A late communication from Dr. Devan shows that the French authorities are more than ever openly hostile to evangelical effort. A colporteur has been arrested and lodged in prison. Two pious soldiers have been put under arrest for reading the Scriptures and observing social worship, which had been the instrument of the conversion of two of their comrades. These desired baptism, which it was not thought prudent to administer immediately, under the circumstances. One of the native assistants of the mission has been threatened with prosecution for itinerancy. These may be but the beginning of sorrows.

Methodist Missions.—At the Monthly Meeting of the Methodist Mission Board, last week, it was resolved to erect a church at Fuh-Chau, in China, where the Board have a promising missionary station, funds nearly adequate having been subscribed for that special purpose. Nine additional missionaries were designated to proceed to California early in April. The anniversary of the Society is to be held at Boston during the session of the General Conference in May.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Sunday among its Advocates—Affairs in the East—Prospect of War in Europe, &c.

Glasgow, March 5th, 1852.

We have often occasion to note how little the authority of Sunday, as a day of rest, is felt among those who profess to regard that authority as supreme. Its observance is enforced, so far as human power can, upon those who, in loving obedience to a wise and Holy God, sanctify the Seventh Day as His; while those who exercise that authority in behalf of a human institution, themselves often practically show that their respect for Sunday extends no farther than their own convenience. Human-law makers are the breakers of the laws of their own making and maintaining. Acts of Parliament compel cessation of work on Sunday in this country; but when we lately lost our Prime Minister, Earl Derby, his "eminently Protestant" successor, met Her Majesty on Sunday, 22d ultimo, in the middle of the day, to consult her wishes on the subject, as afterwards avowed by himself in Parliament. Three weeks previously, 200 mechanics were employed on Sunday, from 10 o'clock in the morning till 10 at night, in preparing the new Houses of Parliament for the accommodation of the Members. Among the operations which had to be performed on that day, were the fixing of the seats of the House of Commons, and the furnishing of the Bishop's Robing Room in the House of Lords. Last Sunday the Prince President of France appointed as the first day of the farce of voting, throughout that country, in the General Election of men to give legislative sanction to his behests—for no more than this seems designed. And this is the man whom the Glasgow Free Press, the Popish Newspaper, (which, by the way, has since ceased to exist,) commended to our regards as having become pious, because he observed the Sunday! Under the authority of the King of Sweden, four Sundays of the year are appointed as fasts, when neither business nor amusement is permitted, while on all other Sundays during the year the theaters are open and business is carried on.

The affairs of the East continue to gather interest. By the latest arrivals, the Turkish Sultan is stated to have absolutely refused to the Viceroy of Egypt the power of life and death; while the latter not only asserts this power to be essential to the maintenance of his authority, but declares his determination to resist the new decree. In the hope, perhaps, of obtaining English intervention, he gives no encouragement to the pushing forward of the Railway across the Desert, to which he had agreed. From the Scriptures we are taught to expect the reorganization of eastern as well as of western lands, and the smallest matter may be the occasion of dismemberment.—Since I last wrote concerning the dispute about "the Holy Places" of Jerusalem as settled to the satisfaction of the Papists, on the basis of the treaty of 1760, the Greeks had succeeded in preventing the ratification of the arrangement. But now again we are informed that the Sultan has definitely decreed that equal rights to these holy places be reserved to all Christian creeds. Meanwhile the French have carried to Paris the Tomb of King David, (so believed,) from among the Royal Tombs situated on the north side of Jerusalem. And among the recent intimations concerning these long stereotyped lands, we learn that the Patriarchs both of Constantinople and Jerusalem have, in their respective synods, published a formal reprobation of the doctrine of baptism professed by all the Bishops of Russia—the validity of baptism by effusion. The Patriarch of Constantinople says, "We possess and we recognize only one baptism—the baptism by immersion."

Among all classes, war seems more and more imminent in Europe. France and Austria menace Switzerland, and have sought to intimidate Belgium also into compliance with their measures. This is said to have led to confederation by the British Government with other of the Continental powers, with the purpose of resisting these aggressions. Belgium has already agreed with an English Company for the laying down of another submarine telegraph from the English coast to Ostend or other place on the coast of Belgium. This new medium of instantaneous communication between our island and the Continent, independently of France, is to be completed in six months. But when God's "sore judgment" of war comes, the hostile parties are likely to fish for wires—and will know where about they may be found, and, possibly, may be taken also. The telegraphs upon our coasts which, since the last war, have been permitted to fall into disuse, and were supposed to have been superseded, are being again put into repair; for God says, in His displeasure, "I will take peace from the earth."

The vessels of Captain Sir Edward Belcher's squadron, destined for farther search for Sir John Franklin's ships, are getting rapidly forward in their preparation for sea. They have already received their full complement of men; and hazardous and severe as the service must be in the Arctic seas, numerous applications had to be refused. J. A. BEGG.

Indian Missions in Oregon.—The Home Missionary for April contains a statement in regard to the conduct of the American Government in Oregon, that ought to attract the earnest attention of every Protestant, and indeed of every republican citizen who honors our free Constitution. It is contained in a letter from Rev. H. H. Spalding, who was formerly a missionary of the American Board, among the Indians of Oregon. Mr. Walker and Dr. Whitman, with their wives, were the first Protestant missionaries in that region. In 1847, after laboring eleven years, they were set upon by the Indians, instigated by the emissaries of popery, several were massacred, others were taken prisoners and treated with great cruelty by Bishop Blanchette, and the rest scattered and driven into the forest, where they nearly perished with hunger and cold. Mrs. Walker died some years after, from the effect of her sufferings. Mr. W. was appointed an Indian Agent by our Government, under the advice of the late Territorial Delegate, Mr. Thurston, with the understanding that he would be stationed at Walilatpu, the scene of the massacre, and thus prepare the way for the resumption of the mission. But the new superintendent first sent Mr. W. to the southern district, and then proceeded to establish a treaty with the Indians by which the United States are bound to keep every Protestant missionary out of the Indian country forever! So says the Independent.

THE SABBATH-KEEPING ADVENTISTS.

Philadelphia, March 9, 1852.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

Having been solicited by an esteemed friend, and a member of the Seventh-day Society of Christians, to give some account of the views and manner of worship of the Sabbath-keeping people with whom I am identified, I send you, for publication in the Recorder, the following.

About ten years ago, a large number of Christians (many thousands) left the several denominational bodies of Episcopal, Presbyterian, Congregational, Methodist, and First-day Baptists, on account of restrictions in those bodies to a full investigation of "all Scripture." Many local causes combined to bring them out, not relevant here to mention. The subject of Baptism became an all-pervading theme; a few, at first, learning and obeying, by going "down into the water," and being immersed beneath; and eventually all learned this truth, and obeyed the commandment—hundreds in one day being baptized in the Delaware from Philadelphia alone; and in many places in New England, in larger proportionate numbers.

About seven or eight years back, some also began to agitate the question, Are we observing the true Seventh-day Sabbath? (I believe it was first mentioned by Bro. Bennett, formerly a Methodist preacher, and still a minister among us, laboring zealously for this truth.) This question having a practical bearing—(involving, in most cases, the cutting off of our way of living and employment; in some instances, as I know, losing good situations, and having no employment for most of a year, and entailing more persecution than any other duty,)—has caused a very protracted controversy, and much hard feeling—perhaps on both sides—among those who had continued for several years in harmony; and it ended at length in a separation into two distinct and very opposite bodies; the First-day portion promulgating a code of absolute doctrines, and disfellowshiping all who would not subscribe to it, and casting off all who would speak in favor of the Seventh-day, calling them Judaizers, &c. My people would proclaim this truth, and practice it, in the face of the Albany Conference, so-called, and have tried to make it plain to them, through published tracts and a paper, and with itinerating preaching, whenever they can get a hearing—from which they are now entirely fenced out; and now they endeavor to strengthen those who hold fast, and gather a little here and there, through the traveling ministry, and telling them that the Sabbath commenced in Paradise, and not at Mount Sinai.

On the evening of the commencement of the Sabbath, about sunset of the close of the sixth day of each week, it has been our custom to assemble, and to thank the God of the Sabbath for the privilege. In the morning, we have preaching, or general exhortation, and reading of the Scriptures respecting the promises to "restore all things." In the afternoon, near the close of the Sabbath day, we usually (not always) celebrate the commandments of our Lord Jesus, as set forth in John's Gospel, 13th chapter, where He says; "If I, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye ought also to wash one another's feet." This we do, serving one another, as unto the Lord; and then "show forth His death," in the Sacramental Supper; thank him with full hearts, and separate. This is the general practice of our Seventh-day people, "wheresoever two or three are gathered together," throughout the scattered ranks.

Many of our people, who love to keep the Sabbath—and to impart this truth, together with the knowledge of the love of Christ—have (since the revolutions in Europe in 1848 and '49) felt it duty to turn their minds and labors towards Jerusalem, to go and seek out the "lost sheep of the house of Israel;" as we realize, from our own past experience, that Christ's gospel, and God's commandment, given to all mankind, both Jew and Gentile, have been preached or taught but partially (if at all) to the Jew; and the general violation of the fourth commandment in the Decalogue by professing Christians (excepting your body) has, no doubt, been the greatest stumbling-block in the way of their receiving the truth of their Saviour unto this day. And, may I not here say to you, my beloved fellow-worshipers, who love to reverence the day that was sanctified in Eden-Paradise—ye, who have so long held up the standard of this primitive law—have ye not something now to do for Israel?—for Jesus' natural brethren?—who have, through keeping the Sabbath, been preserved a distinct, though scattered people—the living evidence that God is true, and that His living oracles, as transmitted to us through them, are also true. Does not our position and knowledge imperatively place us in this attitude, that Sabbath-keeping followers of Christ "Jesus, the King of the Jews," should carry back to the source the light of an unbroken Old and New Testament, to the extinguished candlestick? I appeal to you, my elder brethren of the Sabbath—as Christians—as cross-bearing followers of Christ—to lend us, your younger brethren, aid to go and plant the land of promise—to restore again the Sabbath to that land, from whence it emanated—to feed, clothe, visit the sick and prison-house-bound offcast brethren of Jesus, so that the exscinded branches may again be grafted on their own good olive-tree. All things in the natural and the social world around us, demonstrate that the time is at hand, when God will favor Zion; and is it not "high time that we should awake," when "the night is far spent?"

In bonds of Christ's love, and the fellowship of the gospel of truth, I remain, waiting, a pilgrim to go to Zion, James L. Boyd.

Confession of a Rapping Medium.—Benj. F. Cooley makes a statement through the Springfield Republican in regard to "spiritual rappings," in which he says: Having had extended opportunities for the past three years to investigate the subject, I have arrived at what appears to me to be the true solution of the mystery. I now feel that duty compels me to speak out, and let my fellow-men know what the results of my investigations are. In the first place, let me state, that by the believers in these manifestations I have been considered a good "medium," that I have myself been a believer in the spiritual nature of these manifestations, and have often verily believed that I was conversing with the spirits of the once great men of earth, but who are now the great immortals of higher spheres. Now, my mind is entirely changed, and this change of mind has been produced by a long, deep, and earnest study and investigation of the nature, power, and application of electricity, of the susceptibility of the mind to electrical or psychological changes, and of clairvoyance. All of these taken together, I find, will produce the same mysterious and startling phenomena that have already been produced throughout the country, and attributed to the operations of departed spirits.

Reports of Home Missionaries.—The Secretaries of the American Home Missionary Society have issued a notice requesting each missionary to report before the close of the current year, specifying the topics upon which information is most desired. We copy this specification as a model for others:—

1. Name of the church, town, county, and state, with the Post-Office address of the Missionary.
2. Number of church members, male and female.
3. Average attendance on public worship.
4. Number of hopeful conversions.
5. Number added to the church by profession.
6. Number added to the church by letter.
7. Number of Sabbath-school library.
8. Number of Temperance subscribers.
9. Number of churches organized during the year.
10. Contributions to benevolent objects.
11. Other interesting particulars; such as the erection or completion of church edifices, number of young men preparing for the ministry, establishment of the monthly concert, &c. &c.

Amos Lawrence and his Clerk.—Prof. Tatlock, in a lecture before the North Adams Lyceum, lately, related the following anecdote:—

"About forty years ago, a young man of limited capital commenced business in the city of Boston, and was obliged to employ a single clerk on a small salary. A lady called at his store one day and made some purchases, which she wished delivered at her residence. The merchant requested his clerk to deliver the bundle as required. He declined; the merchant immediately took the bundle and delivered it as directed. The clerk never was worth one hundred dollars in his life—the merchant was—Amos Lawrence, now a millionaire."

College Appropriations.—The several Colleges now before the Legislature for "appropriations," are asking for the sums following, amounting in all to $97,000:—

Rensselaer Institute	$10,000
Madison University	11,000
University of Rochester	16,000
Hamilton College	6,000
Genesee College	16,000
Geneva College	6,000
University of New York	6,000
New York College of Pharmacy	10,000
University of Albany	16,000

Lack of Ministers.—It is stated on the authority of Dr. Baird—than whom few persons are better qualified to speak on the subject—that in the United States the excess of evangelical churches and congregations over the number of ministers in the same denominations, is thirty-four thousand three hundred and ninety.

Sunday-School Books Gratis.—The Secretary of the Massachussetts Sunday-School Society, Rev. Asa Bullard, Boston, gives notice that all the missionaries of the American Home Missionary Society can receive Sunday-school libraries gratuitously.

The Musical World and Journal of Fine Arts, containing 12 8vo. pages, published semi-monthly by Oliver Dyer, New York, at $1 50 per annum, has been received. It has, besides a large amount of interesting reading matter on the subjects indicated by its title, and a likeness of the distinguished composer, William Vincent Wallace, five pages of music; making altogether a very desirable paper for those who feel an interest in musical matters.

The Rev. John Neurman, Superior of the Redemptionists, in Baltimore, has been appointed by Pope Pius IX. Bishop of Philadelphia, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the promotion of Dr. Kendrick to an Arch-Bishopric. The new Bishop is a Bohemian by birth, and is said to possess a high order of talent.

The Lord Bishop of Tuam has declared his readiness to testify an oath, if required, that in his own diocese, within four or five years, ten thousand converts have joined the Protestant Church.

General Intelligence.

SECOND-DAY, MARCH 15.

In the SENATE, a large number of petitions, reports, &c., were presented; among the petitions were several in favor of aiding the Collins Line of Steamers, and several against "the employment of Government agents on the Sabbath." The private bills ordered engrossed on Sixth-day were taken up and passed. A long discussion followed on the foundation of the Capitol Extension, Party Extravagance, &c. Mr. Cass then spoke on the Iowa Land Bill, and was followed by Messrs. Downs and Brodhead.

The HOUSE spent an hour and three quarters in considering and rejecting a motion to increase the number of pages from 11 to 15. The remainder of the day was spent upon the memorial of A. W. Reynolds contesting the seat of R. H. Weightman, Delegate from New Mexico.

THIRD-DAY, MARCH 16.

In the SENATE, Mr. Hale presented a petition from Illinois, "praying the passage of a law restraining employees of Government from laboring on the Sabbath." A short time was spent in considering the bill making an appropriation for continuing the work on the Capitol, and it was finally referred to the Committee on Public Buildings. The Iowa Railroad Bill was then taken up, and after long talk was ordered engrossed, and the Senate adjourned.

The HOUSE spent the day mostly upon the bill for supplying deficiencies in the appropriations for the year ending June, 1853.

FOURTH-DAY, MARCH 17.

In the SENATE, John B. Weller, Senator elect from California, and Stephen Adams from Mississippi, were sworn in. The bill making a grant of land to Iowa for railroad purposes, was taken up and passed. The bill granting land to the State of Missouri for railroad purposes, was taken up, amended so as to conform in its provisions to the Iowa bill, and ordered to be engrossed. The bill provides for two roads, one from Hannibal to St. Joseph's two hundred miles long, and another road two hundred and twenty miles long. Alternate sections for six miles on each side along the railroads, are granted to the State. The Senate then ordered to be engrossed the bill granting land to Arkansas, to aid in the construction of two railroads in that State, one 350 miles long, and the other nearly of the same length; also the bill granting land to Alabama for railroad purposes.

The HOUSE did nothing of general interest, except to talk about the bill to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the present fiscal year.

FIFTH-DAY, MARCH 18.

The SENATE took up and passed the various railroad bills ordered engrossed yesterday. The non-intervention resolutions were then taken up, and the remainder of the day was spent in discussing them, Mr. Jones being the principal speaker.

The HOUSE received and agreed to the report of its Joint Committee of Conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill making Land Warrants assignable. The Deficiencies Bill was then taken up, and political speeches upon it occupied what was left of the day.

The Land Warrant Assignment bill, passed by both Houses, makes warrants of 1850 assignable; it also gives to the State troops of the War of 1812, that were ultimately paid by the National Government, the benefits of the bill of 1850. Moreover, it pays Land Office Registers and Receivers the same compensation they had before the passage of the Bounty Land bill.

SIXTH-DAY, MARCH 19.

The SENATE listened to a personal explanation by Mr. Cass in relation to an old letter; then it passed two private bills, ordered four others to a third reading, and adjourned.

The HOUSE, after spending considerable time to decide what business should take precedence, went into Committee on the private calendar, talked a while about one bill, and then adjourned.

SABBATH-DAY, MARCH 20.

The SENATE was not in session.

In the HOUSE, two or three petitions were read, and then the Deficiency Bill was taken up, and brief speeches upon it were made by Johnson of Arkansas and Brooks of New York; after which the House adjourned.

European News.

The steamer Niagara, with Liverpool dates to March 6, arrived at Boston on the 20th inst.

In England, the Anti-Corn Law League had been revived with great spirit. Large meetings for the purpose had been held at Manchester and Leeds, and at the former, subscriptions to the amount of nearly £40,000 had been raised.

A very serious riot had taken place at Bristol, in consequence of the factory hands at the Great Western Cotton Works refusing to go through a contracted door-way, which had been made by one of the managers, in order to prevent the female operatives (of whom there were several hundred employed in the factory) from carrying off the cotton-waste, for the purpose of destroying it. Fire engines were sent for, which poured an immense stream upon the mob, who, becoming exasperated, returned the attack with a shower of stones and other missiles, and afterward demolished all the windows of the factory. Several persons were severely injured. The magistrates subsequently investigated the case, and fined the manager five pounds for his illegal conduct on the occasion.

The spare materials and fittings of the Crystal Palace are being sold by auction. The first day 350 loads deal planks, battens, &c., were sold for £1,000.

Mr. Spencer Suthers, Cotton Manufacturer at Oldham, aged 60, lately committed suicide by leaping dawn the shaft of a coal mine 435 feet deep. He was suffering from rheumatism, and had been depressed for some time; was in good circumstances, and leaves a highly respectable family.

Messrs. Carmichael & Brett have contracted with the Belgium Government for the building of a submarine telegraph between England and Belgium. They are to have a monopoly for ten years, and the Government's a priority over all other messages.

In France, the re-organization of the National Guard is going forward. A number of companies and several battalions had been already formed.

The result of the elections in France, indicates the existence of a decided opposition to the Government. Cavaignac is elected to the new Legislature, and Carnot has come very near it. In his district there is no election; a second trial will doubtless return him.

M. Bocher's trial had terminated in a conviction, and he was fined 500 francs. The persons who assisted in the circulation of his pamphlet were each fined 150 francs.

The Opinione quotes a letter of the 25th from Milan, which states that the Police had received orders to exercise the strictest surveillance over English travelers. They are not permitted to sojourn more than 24 hours in Lombardy.

An official letter from the Foreign Office, dated March 2, states that the Emperor of Russia had given instructions to the authorities on the East Coast of Liberia and the West Coast of North America, to furnish Capt. Beatson with all possible assistance in his search for Sir John Franklin.

A letter from St. Petersburg, of the 13th ult, in the Courrier du Havre, announces that the Russian Government had resolved to carry into execution the project of establishing a railway from Chartoff to Theodosia, and had accepted the proposition of a private company for that purpose, with a capital of fifty millions of silver roubles, (118,750,000f,) to which the Government had consented to guarantee an interest of 3 per cent. Chartoff is a city of the Ukraine, situated 1,030 kilometres S. E. of St. Petersburgh, and Theodosia or Kaffa is a port on the Black Sea, near the straits of Kertch. It is in contemplation also to establish a railway from Moscow to Chartoff, so that a direct communication will be secured between Petersburg and the Crimea, and the capital of Russia be thus able to communicate in a few days with the Black Sea and Odessa.

Four Days Later.

The U. S. Mail steamer Pacific, with four days later news from Europe, arrived at New York last Sunday, having made the passage in a little more than eleven days.

The advices by the Pacific show no important change from those previously received.

In England, the special elections are going forward without any results to denote a marked change in the position of parties. Parliament, meanwhile, is not in session. The Manchester League is getting ready for its agitation against a return to Protection. The fund of this Association has swollen to £36,000.

In France, the returns show only five Opposition members out of 260 in the new Legislature—no very formidable phalanx to stand up against the gigantic despotism of the Emperor expectant.

Switzerland has arranged the question in dispute as to the French refugees in her territory.

Turkey has another rebellion on hand among her Bosnian subjects. This seems to be more serious than the last, though that was severe enough, and cost bloodshed enough in its suppression.

A riot has taken place at Sassau, in Piedmont, between some citizens and a party of soldiers. It arose at a tavern, and was suppressed with a few killed and wounded on both sides.

A good deal of excitement has been produced in the literary circles of London by the discovery that a volume of Shelley's Letters, just published by Mr. Moxon, were forgeries. He promptly suppressed the work.

M. Bocher, agent of Louis Phillippe's estates, accused of sedition for circulating papers against their confiscation, had been found guilty on his own confession, but fined only $100. The Government are dissatisfied with the sentence.

A disaster has occurred to the French troops in Algeria. The expeditionary column of Gen. Bosquet, after having defeated the vain attempts of Bou Burgnia, remained in its position in the very heart of Kabylia, about 25 miles from Bougia, whence it was able to observe all that was going on in the country. On Feb. 18, the weather began to set in very bad; the rivulets were swollen by the heavy rains; the communications between the town and the camp were interrupted, and the troops began to be in want of provisions. During the night of the 21st there was a very heavy fall of snow; in some places it was six feet in depth, and covered the tents of the soldiers. On the 22d an order was given to strike the camp, and the troops commenced their march toward Bougia. The cold was very severe, and the men, overcome by privations and fatigue, had lost their habitual vigor, and fell dead along the road. The loss of the French column is estimated at 300 men at least.

FUGITIVES ARRESTED IN CALIFORNIA.—Officers Brown and Niven, of New York, arrived on Monday from California, in the steamship Daniel Webster, having in their custody two brothers, named George and James Watson, who are now under indictment for having embezzeled $5,000, the property of Mr. James Morton, a resident of Canada West, but transacting business in New York. It appears that the accused were in the employ of Mr. Morton as agents, and on the 4th of November last, Mr. M., having a draft of $5,000 to meet, remitted the money to the Watsons with instructions to take up the draft. This money was received by the accused, who telegraphed to Mr. M. to that effect. The obligation on becoming due was, however, protested for non-payment, and notice sent to Mr. Morton. On inquiry into the matter, it was ascertained that the Watsons had pocketed the money and had sailed on the 24th of the same month for California. On the 9th of December last the Grand Jury found a true bill against them for embezzelment, and on the 5th January the officers, supplied with a requisition from Gov. Hunt to the Governor of California, and other neccessary papers, sailed in the Prometheus in search of the fugitives, whom they found quietly enjoying the hospitality of one of the best hotels in San Francisco.

Mr. Richard Porter, an overseer of William H. Gaines, Esq., of Warrenton, Va., was severely whipped on the 1st inst., near Brentsville, by four slaves belonging to the latter gentleman. It appears that they stripped him, tied him to a tree, and inflicted upon him such a whipping with hickory rods as it is thought may result in his death.

SUMMARY.

The Utica Gazette contains a brief notice of the death of Dr. Davis, for many years the President of Hamilton College. His whole life has been collegiate. He was graduated at Yale; afterward Tutor at the same College; was Professor of Greek for a number of years at Union, which he left to assume the Presidency of Middlebury College, Vermont. While at Middlebury, he was elected President of Yale College as the successor of Dr. Dwight, which honor he declined. In 1817 he was elected President of Hamilton College, which station he filled 16 years, resigning in 1833. The later years of his life have been spent in seclusion at his residence near the College. For nearly twenty years, scarcely a month has passed in which his death was not expected soon to occur.

The average temperature of the winter months since 1838, as recorded in this City, has been as follows:

Year.	Average 3 mos.	Year.	Average 3 mos.
1838–'39	27°	1845–'46	27½°
1839–'40	28½	1846–'47	29½
1840–'41	28	1847–'48	32¾
1841–'42	32½	1848–'49	29½
1842–'43	29¾	1849–'50	34½
1843–'44	27	1850–'51	34½
1844–'45	30¾	1851–'52	26

This shows that the past winter has been the coldest for 14 years.

The Tribune says:—By the Niagara's mail we have had the pleasure of receiving letters from our friend and associate Bayard Taylor—or, as he is known among the Arabs, Taylor Bey—dated at Khartoum, the chief city of Sennaar, situated at the confluence of the White and the Blue Nile, about half way between Cairo and the Equator. He arrived there on the 12th of January in excellent health and spirits, after a journey on camels across the Nubian Desert, during which he had sundry fortunate adventures, and received every friendly attention from the native chieftains. He was the first American ever seen so far toward Central Africa.

In the District Court of the United States, at Boston, on Friday, Samuel N. Dixey, late Master of the bark Missouri, and Henry C. Pitman, late Master of the ship Sterling, were arraigned on an indictment charging them with stealing from the bark Missouri, on the first day of January, 1850, at a place called Kings Bay, in the Island of Sumatra, in the Indian Ocean, 16,000 Mexican pillared dollars, the property of Messrs. Chamberlain, Phelps, and Lawrence, citizens of the United States of America. To this indictment Dixey pleaded guilty, and Pitman not guilty.

From the San Diego Herald of Feb. 14, we learn that the Mexican Boundary Commission arrived there three days before from the Desert, having lost nearly all their animals from starvation. H. C. Pratt, artist of the Commission, had the likeness of several Indian chiefs, and also a beautiful portrait of Inez Gonzales, the captive girl. Dr. Webb had to abandon all the specimens, but George Thurber had a fine collection of plants.

Col. Quarles, who purchased three of the Massachusetts negroes, lately sold in Texas for having aided in the escape of a slave, has addressed a letter to the Governor of Massachusetts, in which he says that he will surrender them upon the payment of what they have cost him and also the cost of reclaiming a fugitive slave who had escaped to Boston.

In the Assembly of New York, last Sabbath, the Excise Bills were made the special order for Fourth-day week—a movement which is considered by some as tantamount to giving them the go-by.

Capt. R. B. Marcy, of the U. S. Army, has been ordered, by the War Department, with his company, to the head of the Red River, for the purpose of exploring that hitherto almost unknown region of country.

The venerable Bishop Hedding, Senior Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, is gradually yielding to the infirmities of age. His physician at Poughkeepsie says he cannot long survive.

The Post-Office at Franklin, Venango County, Pa., was burned on the 4th inst. The Meadville, Erie, Mercer, Rockland, and Clintonville mails, together with $90 in postage stamps, and all the Post-Office papers were destroyed.

Hon. Henry S. Ellsworth, the former Commissioner of Patents, has the largest corn-fields in the world. He resides in Indiana, and cultivated there last year 12,000 acres of corn.

Advices from Hondurus report a fearful storm in that bay, in which five British vessels were wrecked, including the bark Bathhurst, of London, with all on board.

The Captain of the bark Acteon, from Liverpool, at New Orleans, has been fined $5,000 for criminal assaults upon two female passengers.

The Woodstock, (Va.) Tenth Legion, says that Mr. Lorenzo Sibert, of that place, has invented a machine that will turn out from 50,000 to 100,000 bricks per day.

The Governor of Mass., with the advice of Council, has appointed Thursday, the 8th of April next, to be observed as a day of Public Fasting and Prayer.

One hundred clergymen in Pittsburgh have signed a petition to the Legislature, praying for the enactment of a prohibitory Liquor Law.

It was a son of Dr. Alexander Duncan (and not the Doctor himself) who was accidentally drowned while hunting at the Red Banks, on the Little Miami, 8 miles from Cincinnati.

A young woman threw herself into the Genesee River, at Rochester, the other day, and went over the Falls. Her body has not been recovered.

In Boston last Sixth-day, evening as Mrs. Mowatt, the actress, was returning to the city from an excursion, when opposite Winthrop House, her horse became frightened and fractious, and rearing up fell upon her. She was taken into Winthrop House insensible. Physicians were sent for, and for some time it was feared her injuries were fatal. Subsequently, however, she revived, and requested to be conveyed to the house of her sister, Mrs. Thompson, which was done upon a litter. Two or three ribs were broken, but it is now thought she may recover.

In the Pennsylvania Senate, the bill repealing the 6th section of the act of 1847, forbidding the use of the jails of the Commonwealth for the detention of fugitive slaves, was taken up in order, and after a lengthy discussion and the rejection of sundry amendments, passed—Yeas 21, Nays 12. The bill is the same as that passed at the last session and which was returned by Governor Johnston to the Legislature.

On Tuesday night a man was observed from one of the ferry boats, running between New York and Brooklyn, floating down the East River on a ladder. A small boat was immediately lowered and went to his rescue. He was taken in and conveyed to the ferry-house, when it was ascertained that he was a convict, and that he had escaped from Blackwell's Island, where he had stolen the ladder to assist him in effecting his eacape.

Not long since, a man named W. Patterson, of Oskosh, Wisconsin, was lodged in jail for shooting several children with intent to kill them. It appears that he kept a number of dogs, which he occasionally set on the children going to school, and they opened a fire upon the dogs in return with snow-balls and other missiles. In retaliation, he one day took a double-barreled gun and fired twice upon the crowd. Three or four children were wounded severely.

The schooner E. C. Scranton, Capt. Redfield, sailed from New Haven on Wednesday last for New York, and when off Milford Point, about 2 o'clock P. M., suddenly sunk. Capt. R. saved himself by clinging to the small-boat, until he was taken off, half an hour after the schooner went down, by the schr. Mary Johnson; but the mate, Mr. Wm. Hart, of Guilford, and a young man named Thomas Linsley, of Fair Haven, comprising all on board, were drowned.

There are employed on the southern shore of Lake Superior 710 miners and copper cutters, and 800 surface men and mechanics, and 500 other artizans. Total number of inhabitants, 3,035. The amount of land cleared for agricultural purposes, 20,000 acres. There are 73 horse teams and 30 yoke of oxen. The wages of miners average about $40 per month, surface men about $26 per month good mechanics $45 per month, team and man driver from $4 to $5 per day.

The Cincinnati Inquirer reports a law-case between the Bank of Xenia and certain parties of Cincinnati, which was decided in favor of the latter, as defenders on account of usury, the only usury being the advance of the money on a Bill of Exchange, in uncurrent money at a legal rate, (6 per cent.) and the required payment of the draft at maturity in current funds.

Considerable attention is beginning to be paid to the cultivation of basket willow in the United States. The annual importation of the article into our country amounts to $5,000,000, and this, large as it is, does not satisfy the consumption. The supply is derived from France and Germany, mainly, and costs here from $100 to $130 per tun weight.

The Memphis Appeal says that more sail craft have passed down the Mississippi river during the present season, than were ever remarked before. They generally come out of the Ohio, and are commonly schooner rigged. Ship-building is no longer confined to ports on the coast. It is beginning to form an important item in western industrial statistics.

A late number of the Louisville Courier says: At half-past five o'clock last evening the paper on which this morning's edition of the Courier is printed, was in rags at Mr. Cromie's paper mill. The rags were soon converted into the article we ordered; at fifteen minutes before eight o'clock the paper was delivered at our office ready for the press.

Capt. George Huggins, a citizen of Mobile, died on the 22d of February, a victim to a superstitions presentiment. In the full belief that he would expire on that day, he the week before bought his grave and his coffin, and after only a day's sickness, died on the 22d, between 1 and 2 o'clock P. M.

A new Territory is proposed, comprising that portion of Wisconsin lying north of the 45th degree of north latitude, and that portion of Michigan lying west of Lake Michigan. This territory is very much isolated from the States to which it is attached, and has separate and individual interests peculiarly its own.

The Grand Jury of Schuylkill County, Penn., have made a presentment, in which they say that in Pottsville alone there are about eighty beer and ale houses, a great many of which are a nuisance to the community. They further say that three-fourths of the cases brought into Court originate in these dens of iniquity.

Fifty barrels of alcohol, on the way from Boston to St. John, in the St. Helena, were seized while the vessel touched at Eastport. The case was tried at Machias; the Jury found that the alchohol was not intended for sale at Eastport, and Judge Hathaway ordered that it be restored to the master of the St Helena.

The French ship Elizabeth was lost in the hurricane of the 12th January, off Tampico, with her crew of thirteen men. The French ship Boulonnaise was also lost in the same gale, at the same place, but the crew were saved. The Spanish schooner Matilde was also wrecked near Tabasco.

The Southern Michigan Railroad Company will, on the opening of spring, have a line of three of the best boats on the Lake, consisting of the Empire State and two new boats, the Northern Indiana and Southern Michigan. The road will next month be completed, and form an unbroken railroad connection between Toledo and Chicago.

Famine is prevailing to a considerable extent in Carroll County, Ga. Hundreds of families are almost without provisions, and destitute of the means of supplying themselves. Other counties are similarly affected. Short crops for the past two seasons are alleged as the cause of this privation.

Probably as many as 100 persons who had bought tickets for California in Palmer & Co.'s Independent Line, returned from Chagres to New York last week, having found that their tickets would not pass on the Pacific side. Several prosecutions have been commenced to recover for money paid and time lost.

The office of the Clerk of Kenton County (Ky.) Court was recently entered, and all the papers and records, and $70,000 in bonds and notes, were put into the stove and burned. It was done, it is supposed, by some of the litigants, and $2,000 reward has been offered for their detection.

The Milwaukee Sentinel says that a letter received in that city from Mr. M. Dousman, the patriarch of Mackinac, mentions that the past winter was the severest he has known for fifty years. On the 1st of February there was a snow storm which completely buried many of the houses.

Mr. Henry Gibson, a Revolutioner, died in Orange County last week, and his remains were brought to New York, where a great military display was made, before burying them in Greenwood Cemetery. He was 101 years old.

The stolen Clay medal has not been found, although a reward of $500 was offered for it. Another has been ordered struck. The cost of the original was about $2,500. It has probably been melted into ingots.

There was a freshet in the Hudson River at Albany last week, which cleared out the ice at that place; but it is banked up between there and Hudson, so that navigation is not yet resumed.

Indian depredations in Texas are reported to be of the most alarming character, and the Texas papers urge that unless Government speedily interferes to check them, irreparable damage to life and property must ensue.

The Legislature of Delaware, previous to its adjournment, passed a law declaring that children of manumitted slaves shall not become free, as heretofore, on arriving at a certain age, but shall be held in slavery as long as they live.

The Committee of the House of Representatives having the Discovery of Ether in charge, have decided upon awarding $100,000 to Dr. Morton for his discovery; thus, after the closest investigation, settling his right to that discovery.

A dispatch from Lewes, Del., states that the ledge light-boat in Delaware Bay broke away from her moorings during the late gale, and has not been heard of since. She is supposed to have been blown out to sea.

The steamer Eclipse, which left Louisville for New Orleans on the 23d inst., is the largest and most splendid boat ever built. Her extreme length in 353 feet; width 75 feet. She has ample accommodation for 200 cabin passengers.

MARRIED,

On the 11th of March, by the Rev. R. Hayden, Mr. DORSEY J. STILLMAN to Miss ELIZABETH GAY, all of Poland, N. Y.

In Alfred, N. Y., March 11th, 1852, by H. G. Witter, Esq., Mr GEORGE G. GREEN to Miss MARTHA M. FISHER, all of Alfred.

In Scott, N. Y., on the 16th inst., by Rev. J. S. Lord, Mr. FREDERICK BABCOCK, of Illinois, to Miss MARY KELLEY, of the former place, adopted daughter of Ezekiel G. and Abigail Potter.

DIED,

At his residence at Alfred Center, N. Y., March 12th, DAVID ROSE, in the 50th year of his age. Bro. Rose was a worthy member of the first Seventh-day Baptist Church of Alfred, and a most estimable citizen. From the nature of his disease (inflammation of the lungs) his sickness was short and distressing, but his death was most peaceful and triumphant. During his last moments he sang the praise of God, and when admonished by his wife that such an exercise might be too much for him, said, "I feel as if I could shout glory to God!" N. V. H.

In Scott, N. Y., Feb. 10th, of apoplexy, JOSEPH BURDICK, in the 70th year of his age. He was a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church of that place.

In West Edmeston, N. Y., March 18th, after a long and tedious illness, of cancer, HANNAH, daughter of Benjamin Stillman, aged 55 years. She was a member of the 3d Seventh-day Baptist Church of Brookfield. She bore her sickness with much patience and resignation to the Divine will, and died in peace.

In Milton, Rock Co. Wis., on the 27th April, 1851, ELECTA COON, widow of George S. Coon, in the 54th year of her age. Sister Coon made a profession of religion in early life, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Berlin, Rensselaer Co., N. Y. After a number of years she removed her standing to Alfred, Allegany Co., and from thence to Milton, Rock Co., where she died as she lived, cheerful and happy, in the hope of a blessed immortality.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Miscellaneous.

Tunneling the Hudson.

We find in The Albany Evening Journal a plan for a tunnel across the Hudson for the use of the Railroad lines concentrating at that point. It is communicated to The Journal by Mr. Higham, civil engineer. Application has already been made to the Legislature for permission to make the tunnel, and there appears to be little doubt that the permission will be granted. Should this be a praticable plan, within a moderate expenditure, it will get rid of that great bone of contention between Albany and Troy, a bridge across the Hudson. Mr. Higham estimates the cost at $517,620. The plan is generally as follows:—

It is proposed to commence the work at Quackenbush-street, by an open cutting at a descent of 150 feet per mile to Columbia-st., where a sufficient hight will be attained for the commencement of the tunnel. The tunnel, from Columbia-st. to the river, is to be made in the usual manner, by driving a drift and turning brick arches. From the wharf into the basin, the work will be executed by constructing coffer-dams. From this point, for 600 feet under the channel of the river, it is proposed to sink iron tubes, and turn the arches in the tubes. The remainder of the distance to the open cut on the Green Island will be constructed in coffer-dams; across Green Island there will be open cutting. The form proposed for the tunnel is two circles, connected together by a range of columns; the arches to be of brick, twenty-seven inches thick; the brick to be made for the purpose, of the proper shape; three courses of brick to form the depth of the arch. Where the arches join in the center, on the columns will be cast iron girders. In the bottom of the arches, under the tracks, will be suitable drains to collect any leakage, and a pump at the lowest point (which will be near the pier) for drawing the water from the tunnel. The object of giving this form to the tunnel was to save hight, and to lessen the grades entering into it. That portion of the tunnel across the channel is to be of the same form as the other parts described; but instead of building coffer-dams, it is proposed to dredge the river to its proper depth, and to sink wrought iron tubes in which the brick arches will be turned. The tubes are proposed to be built of boiler plates, made in such lengths as may be found practicable. The plates of the tube to be riveted on ribs of T iron to give them form and stiffness. The ends of the several lengths of tubes, as they are sunk, to have temporary bulkheads, so that the arches through each section may be finished, when the joining will be made by throwing puddling materials on the outside of the tubes, and when tight, taking out the bulkheads and turning the arches at the connections. The materials for the arches to be taken into the tube by pipes rising above the water. From the iron tubes to the east shore of the river it is proposed to make coffer-dams, in sections of from 200 to 300 feet long, by driving piles and puddling between them. On the island the open cutting to be sufficiently wide to have a plank road laid from the mouth of the tunnel to the highway at East Albany, and a branch, or lateral tunnel, will be made on Broadway, between Maiden-lane and Steuben-st., for carriages and foot passengers. A chimney for ventilation (150 feet high) will be constructed on the pier, at which place will be the permanent drawing-pump and the gas works for lighting the tunnel, and the several railroad companies' depots, and the grounds. A staircase will also be made on the pier, and one on Quay-st., to give access to foot passengers into the tunnel. A double track railroad will be made from East Albany to Quackenbush-st., where they will connect with the tracks of the several roads leading into the general passenger depot proposed to be erected for all the railroads terminating at Albany, and the freight grounds of the Albany and Schenectady Railroad. In the tunnel will be a sidewalk, neatly railed in, for foot passengers.

Wreck of the Gen. Warren.

The wreck of the steamer Gen. Warren, on the Oregon coast, and the consequent loss of forty-two lives, was briefly announced in our last. The following particulars are given by a survivor:—

The Gen. Warren had sailed from Astoria on Thursday, 28th January, at 3 o'clock P. M., bound for San Francisco. She got to sea without difficulty, and discharged her pilot, Capt. G. Flavel. After running seaward some distance, she carried away her foretopmast, when the wind hauling to the southeast, and the weather becoming thick, Captain Thompson determined to put back for the harbor. On Saturday, 31st January, at 3 o'clock P. M., he signalized the pilot boat about six miles off the bar, and received on board Capt. Flavel. The vessel was leaking considerably, but could be kept free by her engine pumps. Capt. Thompson urged the pilot to take the vessel into port immediately. The pilot remonstrated, saying the bar was too heavy to be crossed in safety. As Capt. Thompson was fearful that if the wind increased, the vessel would be driven northward, the pilot was induced, much against his judgment, to comply. The bar was crossed at 5 P. M. in safety, when the weather suddenly shut in extremely foggy and dark. It was found necessary, before crossing the bar, to detach the engine pumps, in order to save steam; the hand pumps being in active operation. The pilot stationed three men on the look-out, who soon discovered the breakers close to Sandy Island. The pilot immediately ordered the helm to be shifted, but finding that she would not answer it, he ordered the engine to be stopped and the anchors let go.

The vessel was then in six fathoms of water. The captain here said to the pilot, "Don't let go the anchor, back her; she will back as fast as she will go ahead." The engine was then ordered to be reversed. The engineers not being at the stations, their order was not obeyed, and the vessel continued to go ahead rapidly. The order to let go the anchor was repeated and executed. At this moment she struck in sixteen feet water. The anchor was hove up after she struck two or three times. As soon as the anchor was off the ground, she sheered off into ten fathoms water, without appearing to have sustained any damage. Capt. Thompson soon discovered that the vessel was making water rapidly, and reported it to the pilot. In a few minutes it was apparent that the vessel was sinking, when the pilot got the order to "beach her without delay!" The pilot, amazed, inquired of the captain if she would not live half an hour? Capt. Thompson replied she could not. The vessel was then headed for Clatslope Spit, where she was beached. This occurred about 7 o'clock P. M.

Immediately upon her grounding, all hands, both passengers and crew, commenced heaving overboard the deck-load, for the purpose of easing her. The surf broke over her with such violence, that the main saloon was stove, and was fast being detached from the hull. The starboard quarter boat was washed from the davits—the larboard boat, the only means by which the lives of so few were saved, was, by the great exertions of Captain Thompson, preserved. With the utmost difficulty he conveyed it forward, and had it secured. At about 9 o'clock, all that portion of the vessel abaft the foremast, was carried away—the sea making a clean breach over the remainder. Up to this time no lives had been lost—the entire ship's company and passengers having mustered on the forecastle and in the fore rigging, trusting that the wreck would hold together until daylight, when assistance might be procured from shore. The sea increasing in violence, and finding that the wreck was rapidly going to pieces, Captain Thompson, at about 3 o'clock A. M., selected a boat's crew, ten in number, from among his crew and passengers, and requested Captain Flavel to launch the boat and take command of her. He ordered the boat to pull for the shore, and procure any assistance that could be had. In the selection of the boat's crew for this perilous expedition, Captain Thompson was cautious to choose men in whose return he could implicitly rely. As there was a storng ebb tide, the boat was doubly manned, in order to expedite her movements, and assist in passing the breakers, which there was little hope of their ever crossing in safety. This last measure was resorted to by the captain, knowing that it would be the only chance of being saved by remaining upon the wreck, to the peril of passing the breakers in the boat. There was no excitement—no confusion; all that was accomplished, was done in the most systematic and orderly manner. The boat encountered great difficulty in passing the breakers, having shipped a sea from which she incurred great danger of being swamped. The weather still being very thick, she was compelled to run entirely by the roar of the breakers. After about an hour's hard labor, the hights of Chinook, (called Scarborough's claim), were discovered. The pilot, upon finding his exact position, steered for Astoria, where he fell in with the brig Francisco, lying at anchor off Tansy Point. Upon inquiring of the captain of the brig if he had a boat which could prove of assistance to the wreck, he was informed that the only boat belonging to the vessel was too small to live in the breakers. The pilot then proceeded with his crew to Astoria, where he boarded the bark George and Martha. Capt. Beard, of this vessel, lost no time in dispatching his first officer and an able crew in a whale-boat to the assistance of the wreck. The steamer's boat then left for the shore, where the pilot and his wearied associates manned a large surf-boat, and proceeded to the scene of disaster, when, to their horror, they could discover no vestige of either wreck, passengers, or crew.

Morse's Telegraph in Europe.

We mentioned among our recent foreign intelligence, that the King of Wurtemburg had awarded the State Medal of that kingdom to Professor Morse, the inventor of the American Telegraph. "This," says the N. Y. Observer, "is the third of the crowned heads of Europe who have conferred this honor upon our country. The Grand Sultan of Turkey took the lead, both in the time of manifesting his appreciation of the invention, and in the high distinction bestowed upon the inventor. The King of Prussia followed, and, on establishing the Electric Telegraph throughout his dominions, directed that the American system should be used wherever intelligence is transmitted through 'great distances.' And now, the King of Wurtemburg adopts entire the American system. It will be seen also that the German Telegraphic Union, comprising all the States of Germany, after deliberating in convention at Vienna, on the best system for their 'international correspondence,' have come to the conclusion that none but the American system will fully accomplish their object. Professor Steinheil, the Administrator-in-chief of the Austrian Telegraphs, although himself the inventor of an electric telegraph, which has procured for him a world-wide and well-deserved fame, with a magnanimity which does him high honor, has given his opinion in favor of adopting the American system in Germany."

California Agriculture.

Mr. Andrew Williams lately delivered an address upon the "Mineral and Agricultural Capabilities of California," before a numerous assembly of the friends of agriculture in San Francisco. The address contains one of the most extraordinary statements of facts we have ever read. We present to our readers a few of its most remarkable passages, from a report in the San Francisco Herald.

"In most of the other States a single excellence is characteristic and predominant. The lumber of Maine, the granite of New Hampshire, the wool of Vermont, the manufactures of Massachusetts, the agriculture of New York, the coal and iron of Pennsylvania, the grain and fruits of the Middle and Western States, the copper of Michigan, the corn, tobacco, and hemp of Virginia and Kentucky, the cotton of Alabama and Georgia, the sugar of Louisiana, the sugar, cotton, and indigo of Texas, the turpentine of North Carolina, and the rice of South Carolina, constitute respectively their most prominent and distinctive interests, and are the pride and glory of their citizens. But there is scarcely one of these that cannot be found or produced in our own State. In the natural productions of the earth conducive to the sustenance of man, is our State abundantly prolific.

"As we approach the center of the State, the banana, the orange, the lemon, the olive, the fig, the plantain, the nectarine, the almond, the apricot, and the pomegranate of the South, mingle in the same luxuriant gardens of Los Angelos, with the peach, the pear, the cherry, the plum, the quince, and the apple of the North,—the fruits of the oak and the pine, of gigantic size and delicious taste, furnishing to man and beast the richest and most nutritious food; the beautiful salmon of the noble Sacramento, often weighing thirty, forty, and, in some instances, sixty pounds, vieing with any, either in fineness of texture and richness of flavor, as well as in size; and one uncommon article of fine white sugar, the exudation of a species of pine tree called the sugar pine; the successive ranges of mountains, whose extent is lost to view in the distance, waving with rich harvests of oats, the spontaneous production of the soil; solid trees of the red wood on the banks of the Trinity and Shasta rivers, sixty-eight feet in circumference; hollow ones whose cavity has sheltered sixteen men and twenty mules for the night; pines crowning the dizzy peaks of the Sierra Nevada, three hundred and eighty feet in hight, the first two hundred and fifty feet without a branch or limb—an extent of growth so far beyond the ordinary size, as to seem almost incredible, but well known, and seen, and verified by the uniform and concurrent testimony of many whom I see sitting around me."

Tenacity of Life in Polypi.

A recent English publication on the "Passions of Animals," the range of the volume reaching from the lowest animal life up to the dog, gives the following facts illustrative of the tenacity of life in the polypi:

"Among the lower animals, this faculty is the most remarkable is the polypi; they may be pounded in a mortar, split up, turned inside out like a glove, and divided into parts, without injury to life: fire alone is fatal to them. It is now about a hundred years since Trembly made us acquainted with these animals, and first discovered their indestructibility. It has subsequently been taken up by other natural historians, who have followed up these experiments, and have even gone so far as to produce monsters by grafting.

"If they be turned inside out, they attempt to replace themselves; and if unsuccessful, the outer surface assumes the properties and the powers of the inner, and the reverse. If the effort be partially successful only, the part turned back disappears in twenty-four hours in that part of the body it embraces, in such a manner that the arms which projected behind are now fixed in the centre of the body; the original opening also disappears, and in the room of feelers a new mouth is formed to which new feelers attach themselves, and this new mouth feeds immediately. The healed extremity elongates itself into a tail, of which the animal has two. If two polypi be passed into one another like tubes, and pierced through with a bristle, the inner one works its way through the other, and comes forth again in a few days; in some instances, however, they grow together, and then a double row of feelers surround the mouth. If they be mutilated, the divided parts grow together again, and even pieces of two separate individuals will unite into one."

The Cold of the Arctic Regions.

Dr. Kane's lectures on the Arctic expedition, have been delivered in Baltimore, and are published at length in the Patriot. The following in relation to the cold of the Arctic region, will be read with interest:—

"The cold came upon the voyagers gradually, and by habit they were enabled to keep as warm as necessary, without fires, for weeks after the thermometer was several degrees below zero. In the second week of September, the water casks froze up, and it became necessary to quarry out the ice and melt it before it could be used. By and by the waters of the sea congealed around them, and they were glued up in fixed ice. Moisture began to be a rarity, everything being frozen perfectly dry. The opening of a door was followed by a gust of smoke-like vapor, and outside every smoke-pipe exhaled purple steam. All their eatables froze into a mass of laughable solidification. Sugar was soon cut with a saw, butter with a chisel, and beef with an axe and crowbar!

The "crawl," the chill, the sensation of "cold," which at home is a temporary change of state, was here unknown—cold, of a highly wrought intensity, the one unvarying condition! When the mercury froze, alcoholic thermometers fell below 50 deg., or 80 odd below the freezing point; regular inspections took place during and after the walks of the men. A white spot on the nose, lip, or cheek, was a signal for a most uncharitable rubbing with snow; and many a time poor Jack, when pining for a warm stove, has been obliged to take, instead, a course of medical friction, with compulsory exercise. On one occasion, a poor fellow, recovering from an attack of inflammation of the lungs, was asked by his doctor, how a certain frost-bitten ear came on? "Why," said he, producing a carefully folded scrap of an old newspaper, "I didn't want to trouble you, Doctor; it dropped off last week; here it is." But the most distressing feature of their Arctic winter was the darkness of its long night, when for eighty days the sun was not visible. During this season, the Aurora Borealis was an almost nightly visitor. The Aurora of the far North, however, is not the splendid display, either of illustration, or color, or movement, which we see in the more southern latitudes; it resembles a white moonlit cloud, impressed clearly against the pure blue of the sky. Many other interesting phenomena of the the Arctic night were described by the lecturer."

An Apple Woman Puzzled.

A few days since, a pleasant-looking, middle-aged man, with iron-gray hair, stopped at an apple-woman's stand on Chestnut street, Philadelphia, and buying one of her finest pippins, he cut it in two, when, much to the woman's astonishment, a five-dollar gold piece rolled out from the core. "Why," said he, "these are golden pippins you sell; shall I have another at the same price?" She was so astonished at the occurrence as to be unable to reply, and the buyer, taking silence for consent, cut another, when a golden seed of still greater value dropped from it. Recovering from her surprise, she refused to sell any more to him, and forthwith commenced cutting her apples upon her own account, without finding what she expected. The purchaser was, after some haggling about the price, suffered to pay for another apple, and the woman was again surprised by a golden eagle being found within it. A crowd had by this time gathered, who, recognizing Blitz in the purchaser, enjoyed the amazement of the woman. She was about to cut another pippin, when Blitz offered to show her how to accomplish the feat. Lending her his own knife, he used a little magic powder, and on cutting the apple, she found her labors rewarded with a quarter eagle. This Blitz allowed her to keep in return for his joke.

Sandwich Islands Items.

Considerable interest is manifested among the planters of the islands in the project of cheap labor by the introduction of coolies from China. This subject has engaged their attention for several years, and the experiment seems never to have been satisfactorily tried. The British bark Thetis, Captain Cass, arrived from Amoy, China, during the first of the month, with a cargo of coolies, most of whom were contracted for by planters and others at the Islands.

The Polynesian chronicles the arrival of the fine clipper ship, R. B. Forbes, ninety-nine days from Boston. She arrived at Honolulu on the morning of the 5th January, in command of Capt. Doane. This was a fine passage.

The attempt to bring a swarm of bees from Boston around the Cape, in the ship R. B. Forbes, has failed. They came very well until entering the tropics on the Atlantic side, when the wax melted, and they were destroyed. Their introduction is considered very desirable, and beside the satisfaction of succeeding, the Agricultural Society has offered a premium to the person who shall first introduce the honey-bee into the Islands.

New Route to California.

Lewis H. Cormick & Co., of New Orleans, are about to propose to Congress to carry the mails from New York to San Francisco in fifteen and a half days, and from New Orleans to San Francisco in twelve and a half days. From New York to Vera Cruz, 1,800 miles, they will run by steam in six days, and from New Orleans to the Mexican port in three and a half days. From Vera Cruz, via Puebla, to the navigable waters of the river Zacatula, 220 miles by coach, in thirty-six hours; to the mouth of the Zacatula, 260 miles by steamboat in 48 hours; from the mouth of that river to San Francisco, 1,600 miles, by steam, in 6 days. This will make but 25½ days traveling from Liverpool to San Francisco, supposing the trip across the Atlantic to be accomplished in 10 days. Supposing these promises to be fulfilled, it is evident that all the bullion and drafts sent between the respective points, as well as a very large proportion of the passengers, must pass over this route. The Company hold a contract with the Mexican Government which gives them the right to transport foreign mails across the territory of that Republic, by paying a tax of 20 cents per lb. on letters, and 20 cents per cwt. on papers. [Tribune.

Telegraph to the Pacific.

Henry O'Reilly, of telegraphic celebrity, is now earnestly engaged in promoting the project of extending the telegraph westward to the Pacific, and is sanguine of being able to have it in operation to San Francisco within eighteen months, provided Congress shall make a favorable response to his memorial asking for right of way through the wilderness, and protection to his wires. He seeks no pecuniary aid, but simply proposes to supersede the present system of forts at long distances, with large garrisons, by establishing stockades twenty miles apart, each of twenty dragoons. He proposes that two or three soldiers shall ride daily each way from each stockade, so as to transport a daily express letter mail across the continent; while at the same time protecting and comforting emigrants and settlers along the public domain; and thus incidentally furnishing all the protection which the telegraph will require. The distance between Missouri and San Francisco is about 2,300 miles. The mail service, conducted with military precision, therefrom, ought to be accomplished in from twelve to fourteen days.

Tobacco.

The extent to which the use of this hurtful weed is being carried, may well excite inquiry and alarm. The cultivation of it has gone beyond exhausting the fertility of the richest portion of the South. Some of the best lands in New England and New York are now used for the same purpose. Onondaga county, according to a late statement, has exchanged the culture of wheat, to no inconsiderable degree, for that of tobacco. In traveling though one of the richest tracts of Connecticut, not long ago, we noticed that tobacco was extensively culivated. The amount of this plant now raised in Kentucky is yearly increasing. An intelligent merchant and tobacco inspector in Louisville, writes in the Albany Journal: "Our tobacco enterprise is moving along in a steady and sure way, and promises finally to work as favorably as we have ever anticipated. The crop is immense, say twenty-five thousand hogsheads over last year; and from the indications, large amounts will seek this market for sale or shipment."

STONE-DRESSING BY MACHINERY.—A newly-invented machine for cutting and dressing stone for buildings, is described with illustrations in the Scientific American. A rough stone is placed on a carriage, and rolled under the machine, where it receives the edges of three rotating quoit-shaped self-sharpening rolling cutters, secured on the extremities of three arms, which are fixed on a boss fastened to a shaft. The shaft is moved by a large pulley connected by a belt with a steam engine. The cutters are raised or lowered, as the desired thickness of the stone may require, by turning a spindle. The polisher is an iron disc, which operates by a rotary motion. Its face always acts true on a plane, consequently the whole face of the stone is always polished correctly. A hopper with sharp sand, having a small hole at its lower part, is placed in the polisher frame above the stone. A small stream of water through a tube from above, percolates through the sand, carrying a portion of it down on the stone. The machine appears to be a very complete one.

CONNECTING THE ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC.—The subject of a rapid communication between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, has been introduced by Capt. Synge, R. E., to the notice of the Royal Geographical Society. Capt Synge argues plausibly in favor of the passage by way of British North America, which he claims to be the shortest direction geographically. By the proposed route, the distance from England to Hong-Kong is reduced to 10,490 miles, or, a saving of from three to five thousand miles over any other line of communication, not excepting the Central American. The new project is commended on the score of economy of time and labor, speed, position, salubrity, comprehensiveness, inviolability of advantages, prompt connections, consequent good effects, the opportunity of colonization, and the growth of the maritime power of England.

DEATH OF WILLIAM PITT.—Pitt died at a solitary house on Wimbledon Common. Not far off the roadside, stood and still stands, a small country inn, where the various parties interested in the great statesman's life were accustomed to apply for information, and leave their horses and carriages. On the morning of the 22d of January, 1806, an individual having called at the inn, and not being able to obtain a satisfactory reply to his inquiries, proceeded to the house of Pitt. He knocked, but no servant appeared; he opened the door and entered, he found no one in attendance; he proceeded from room to room, and at length entered the sick chamber, where, on a bed, in silence and in perfect solitude, he found, to his unspeakable surprise, the dead body of that great statesman, who had so lately wielded the power of England, and influenced, if he did not control, the destinies of the world. We doubt whether any more awful example of the lot of mortality has ever been witnessed!

OLD FASHION.—It is a curious fact, worth mentioning, that among the relics of art disinterred by Layard from the ruins of Ninevah, may be seen various ornamental devices exactly like some of the fashions of our own day. Among the rings and bracelets, for instance, of which Layard made excellent drawings, may be seen patterns which look as if manufactured from the designs of London and Paris jewelers of the present day. In one of the engravings of Layard's researches, we have a drawing of a horseman with his riding whip, the handle of which is a gazelle's foot, exactly like the present fashion as it is frequently seen in the finish of hunting whips. Verily, there is nothing new under the sun, telegraphs and steam engines excepted.

VARIETY.

The Boston Medical Journal mentions the following simple and economical apparatus for overcoming bad odors, and purifying any apartment where the air is loaded with noxious materials: Take one of any of the various kinds of glass lamps—for burning camphene, for example—and fill it with chloric ether, and light the wick. In a few minutes the object will be accomplished. In dissecting rooms, in the damp, deep vaults where vegetables are sometimes stored, or where drains allow the escape of offensive gases, in outbuildings, and in short in any spot where it is desirable to purify the atmosphere, burn one of these lamps. One tube, charged with a wick, is sufficient.

Shame recently caused the death of a young woman, in the London Lying-in Hospital. She had given birth to an illegitimate child, and was doing well. She continued to progress favorably, till one day a girl, who had formerly been her fellow-servant and her friend, chanced to enter her apartment whilst she was caressing her child. The poor woman was, in consequence, so overwhelmed with a sense of shame and degradation, as to bring on a fever, of which she died in less than a week.

At the New York banquet given to Kossuth, the great Hungarian said: "I would rather starve than rely for myself or family on foreign aid; but for my country's freedom, I would not be ashamed to go a begging from door to door." This sentiment is appreciated by every one, and was received, when uttered, with applause. May not Christian devotion and zeal find and example here?

A correspondent of the Philadelphia Christian Chronicle, who is attending a course of lectures at Edinburgh University, in Moral Philosophy, under Professor Wilson, and in Bells-Letters, under Sir William Hamilton, says there are 1200 students in attendance, some from Egypt, Persia, Greece, France, Germany, Russia and America.

"Sire, one word," said a soldier one day to Frederick the Great, when presenting to him a request for a brevet of lieutenant. "If you say two," answered the prince, "I will have you hanged." "Sign," replied the soldier. The monarch, surprised at his presence of mind, immediately granted his request.

The Treasurer of Oberlin College, Hamilton Hill, gives notice to the subscribers to the $100,000 fund, that the entire subscription was completed on the 20th January, only fourteen months from the commencement of the effort. Henceforth, the teachers are to be supported from the income of this fund.

"I hold it as a fact," said Pascal, "that if all persons knew what they said of each other, there would not be four friends in the world. This is manifest from the disputes to which indiscreet reports from one to another give rise."

A trade-museum is earnestly recommended by scientific men in England. A collection of the substances used in Manufactures, both raw and in the various stages of preparation, with information regarding prices and statistics, is the plan suggested.

"The hardest fare I ever experienced," said an old codger, "was the time when I got lost in the woods. I slept on a rock, and cracked butternuts with my teeth, for a living." Them was hard times.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress.
Rev. J. W. MORTON, } Assistants.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, }

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—
The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " Dec. 3 " March 16.
" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term, Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00

JERUSALEM—JEWS OF PALESTINE.

[About the year 1838, the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland appointed a Committee to consider what might be done in the way of setting on foot missionary operations among the Jews. That Committee determined, as a preparatory step, to send a Deputation to Palestine and other countries, to visit and inquire, 'concerning the Jews that had escaped and were left of the captivity, and concerning Jerusalem.' "It was a token for good at the very outset, that Dr. BLACK, Professor of Divinity in the Marischal College, Aberdeen, and Dr. KEITH, Minister of St. Cyrus, whose writings on the evidence from fulfilled prophecy have been so extensively read and blessed, were willing to give themselves to this work, along with two younger brethren, Rev. R. M. M'CHEYNE, Minister of St. Peter's, Dundee, and Rev. ANDREW A. BONAR, Assistant Minister of Collace, Perthshire." The Deputation set out in April, 1839, and passed through London, Paris, Lyons, Genoa, Leghorn, Alexandria, &c., reaching Jerusalem in June. Their account of what they saw at Jerusalem, and throughout Palestine, is the most natural and interesting narrative that we know of upon the subject. We have thought that a series of extracts from it would interest the readers of the Recorder just at this time when the subject of a Jewish mission is under discussion among us.]

Our camels kneeled down in the open space within the gate of Jerusalem, and we rested for a short time while Ibraim sought out the residence of Mr. Young, the British Consul, to whom we had letters of introduction. He soon returned to say that the Consul was waiting for us, and would procure a lodging in part of an unoccupied house near the Latin Convent. Our camels and servants moved slowly away to their place of destination, and we followed Ibraim down the steep and slippery street opposite the Jaffa Gate. In a few minutes we were at the house of Mr. Young, who received us with the greatest kindness. He told us the general state of matters in Jerusalem. The plague had not yet left the town, but the number of cases was decreasing; and there was no cordon drawn round the walls as had lately been the case. He strongly recommended us not to encamp on the Mount of Olives as we had proposed, but to live in the town, and use the ordinary precautions of touching nobody in the streets, and receiving all articles of food though water. He then introduced us to two travelers just returned from Petra by the way of Hebron, Lord Claud Hamilton and Mr. Lyttleton. The former was not a little surprised to meet in Jerusalem with Dr. Black, whom he had known in former days as a laborious student and theologian, and unassuming Minister in the parish of Tarvis in Aberdeenshire.

Two large apartments were assigned to us on Mount Acra, floored with stone, with a pleasant open space on the roof between them.

Worn out with incessant traveling, we were thankful to retire, that we might refresh our weary frames and compose our minds, which were not a little bewildered by the multitude of feelings that had passed through them this day. We had not long rested when Mr. Nicolayson, Missionary of the London Society for the Conversion of the Jews, called to welcome us to the Holy City, as brethren and friends of Israel. He stayed a considerable time with us; talking over our journey, the object of our visit, his own sphere of labor and hopes of success, and many matters regarding the spot where we now were. It was a desultory but pleasant conversation, a conversation about the people and land of Israel while really sitting in their ancient capital. Lord Hamilton called in the evening, and told us much of what he had seen in Petra and the land of Egypt. When the darkness came down we heard the wailings of mourners over some dead friend, a peculiarly melancholy sound at all times, but doubly so while the plague is raging. Yet we never heard any more joyful sounds in the streets of Jerusalem, so true is the prophetic word, "I will cause all her mirth to cease."

It was with feelings that can be better imagined than described, that for the first time in our lives within the gates of Jerusalem, we committed ourselves and those dear to us, our Church, and the blessed cause in which she had sent us forth, to the care of Him who sits as a King upon the holy hill of Zion. We are not aware that any clergyman of the Church of Scotland was ever privileged to visit the Holy City before, and now that four of us had been brought thus far by the good hand of our God upon us, we trusted that it might be a token for good, and perhaps the dawn of a brighter day on our beloved Church, a day of generous, self-denied exertion in behalf of scattered Israel and a perishing world.

(Saturday, June 8.) We had spread our mats on the cool stone floor, hoping for a night of calm repose, but our rest was broken and uncomfortable in the extreme, our rooms being infested with vermin, a kind of trial which travelers in the East must make up their minds frequently to undergo. All our annoyance, however, was forgot by sunrise. We rose early, and finding the road to the Jaffa Gate, went a little way out of the city and sat down under an olive-tree. We turned to Psalm xlviii. "Great is the Lord, and greatly to be praised, in the city of our God, in the mountain of his holiness. Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, is Mount Zion, on the sides of the north, the city of the great King. God is known in her palaces for a refuge." Reading this with the eye upon Jerusalem, the scenes of former days seemed to rise up as a flood. We could imagine holy prophets and men of God in these fields and within these walls. The vivid associations of the place, with all our Bible readings and hours of holy study, made it appear like a spot where we had once met with beloved and honored friends, whose absence spreads a sadness over all. We read part of Lamentations, and could feel sympathy with the prophet when he cried, "How hath the Lord covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud in his anger, and cast down from heaven unto the earth the beauty of Israel." "He hath swallowed up Israel; he hath swallowed up all her palaces."

In the forenoon, Mr. Nicolayson kindly insisted on our removing from our house on Mount Acra, to one of the Mission-houses upon the northern brow of Mount Zion. Mr. Pieritz and Dr. Gerstmann, the medical missionary, being from home, we were put in possession of their comfortable rooms, with an outer one for our two Arab servants. In this house, one of our windows opened toward the east, having a fine view of the dome of the Mosque of Omar, which rises over the site of Solomon's Temple, and beyond it was the Mount of Olives. That ever-memorable hill, with its three summits, its white limestone rocks appearing here and there, and its wide bosom still sprinkled over with the olive-tree, was the object on which our eye rested every morning as we rose, an object well fitted to call to mind the words of Jesus spoken there, "Watch ye, therefore, for ye know not when the Master cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning." Toward the west, the object that first met our eye used to be a solitary palm-tree, growing amidst a heap of ruins, and waving its branches over them, as if pointing to the fulfillment of the prophecy, "Jerusalem shall become heaps."

The site of the proposed Hebrew church was not far off. It is close to Mr. Nicolayson's own house. At that time the foundations were only digging, and builders were preparing the stones, which we saw camels carrying into town, and were told that they were brought from a quarry a few miles north of Jerusalem, near a village called Anata, the ancient Anathoth, where Jeremiah was born. In seeking a solid foundation they had already dug down about forty feet, and had not yet come to the rock. They laid bare heap after heap of rubbish and ancient stones. It is a remarkable fact, which cannot but strike the traveler, that not only on Mount Zion, but in many parts of the city, the modern town is really built on the rubbish of the old. The heaps of ancient Jerusalem are still remaining; indurated masses of stones and rubbish forty and fifty feet deep in many places. Truly the prophets spoke with a divine accuracy when they said, "Jerusalem shall become heaps." "I will make Jerusalem heaps." And if so, shall not the future restoration foretold by the same lips be equally literal and full? "The city shall be builded upon her own heap." The fact that these heaps of ruins are of so great depth, suggested to us a literal interpretation of the words of Jeremiah, "Her gates are sunk into the ground." The ancient gates mentioned by Nehemiah are no longer to be found, and it is quite possible that several of them may be literally buried below the feet of the inquiring traveler.

During the day we bagan inquiries after the Jews in their own land. We were told that the plague prevailed most of all in their quarter, and that we must be very cautious in visiting their houses. Meanwhile Mr. Nicolayson afforded us every information. The difficulties in the way of the conversion of the Jews are certainly greater in Palestine than elsewhere. The chief of these difficulties are—1. That Jerusalem is the strong-hold of Rabbinism; the Jews here being all strict Rabbinists, and, as might be expected, superstitious in the extreme. 2. A Missionary has fewer points of contact with the Jews here than in other countries. He cannot reach them through the press, nor address them in large assemblies; his work must be carried on entirely by personal intercourse, so that it is like wrenching out the stones of a building one by one. 3. The opposition to an inquiring or converted Jew is here much greater than in any other country, for it is regarded as a very awful calamity that any one should become an apostate in the Holy City. 4. All the Jews in the Holy Land are more or less dependent on pecuniary supplies annually sent from Europe. But the moment any one is known to be inquiring after Christ, he is cut off from all share in this fund, and is thrown utterly destitute.

Schools for Jewish children have never been established in Jerusalem; and, in the present state of things, it seems impossible that they could succeed; for there are not here, as in Poland and Germany, any wordly inducements to prevail with Jews to send their children to be educated, there being no situations of wealth or distinction open to their young men, which might tempt them to accept of a liberal education for their youth. The London Society have entertained the plan of instituting a school for converts, in which many branches of general knowledge would be taught, and this might perhaps allure some of the brethren to attend.

In regard to Missionaries, a converted Jew is in some respects a better missionary than a Gentile. It is true he meets with greater opposition in the first instance, but in process of time, the fact of his change never fails to make an impression on his brethren, provided they see in him consistency of temper, character, and life. A Jew will indeed listen more readily to a Gentile Christian, and show him more respect; but then he listens more carelessly and thinks less of what is said, because he thinks it natural for a Gentile so to speak. A Gentile missionary, again, has the advantage of more ready access to the Jews, being regarded with far less prejudice; but a Jewish convert is more efficient where confidence is one established. Perhaps the true principle in missions to the Jews, is to unite both Jewish and Gentile laborers in the same field.

The importance of erecting a church on Mount Zion, where Protestant worship might be maintained in its purity, is that it may open the eyes of the Jews to see what true Christianity is. At present, they justly regard the Greek and Romish churches as idolatrous and licentious in the extreme, and believe the English to be Neologians or Infidels, without any religion.

The hope of Messiah's coming is strong in the hearts of many Jews here. Many believed that it would be in the year 1840, as that was the end of a period fixed in the book of Zohar; and some said that if they were disappointed in that year, they would turn Christians; but this is a mere saying, for they have often declared the same before, and when the time came have found out excuses for Messiah's delay.

The fact that Palestine is the stronghold of Rabbinism appears to be a sufficient reason why Christians should direct their most vigorous efforts to send the light of the gospel among the Jews of this land. There have been many tokens for good and encouraging appearances of late years among the Jews of Jerusalem. Their wretched condition in the city where their fathers ruled, loudly calls for sympathy. They are poor and despised, and sadly divided among themselves. The Consul told us of a Jew who last week was beaten till he died, by order of the Governor. He was not proved to be guilty of the offense laid to his charge, and was not in reality guilty, yet there was none to plead his cause, or avenge his murder. [To be continued.

THE LORD HATH NEED OF HIM.

The animal of which the Lord had need, when he was about to ride into Jerusalem shortly before his crucifixion, was the property of persons who perhaps knew very little if any thing of the true character of Jesus Christ. Yet, through a divine influence upon their minds, they assented to his claim instantly, freely, cheerfully; not uttering a complaint on the ground of their own right, nor charging the Saviour with making an excessive or unreasonable demand. Oh that every claim made upon us and upon our possessions by the voice of providence in favor of Jesus Christ were as cheerfully responded to and as readily met!

This form of words suggests a solution of many difficulties which occur in the progress of the missionary work. They are also richly suggestive in respect to the demands of Christian benevolence.

Many things which we call our own, and in which we deem that we have an exclusive right, are things of which the Lord has need. If he calls for them, we should be ready to yield them up at his bidding. If he takes them we should quietly submit. The whisper of his will, borne to us in the dealings of his providence, should be in our view a sufficient justification of his demands and of his proceedings.

Young and promising missionaries are sometimes sent forth with fair prospects of long life and extensive usefulness. In a few months or years—sometimes by the next mail which reaches us after that which announces their arrival at their destined field—we are told that they are dead. So Thomas died before he reached his post. So Dr. James and wife were lost in the China Sea, having not yet entered on their work; God accepting it of them that it was in their hearts to labor and to suffer for his name. So Munson and Lyman were sacrificed in the strength of their manhood by the cannibals of Sumatra. Colman and Wheelock died before they had reached the summit of the hill of life; their sun went down before it was noon; Mrs. Judson died at the age of thirty-seven; Henry Martyn, at thirty-one; Boardman, at thirty; and Harriet Newell, still earlier. What shall we say to these things? Simply this: "The Lord had need of them." God has more worlds than one to care for. The heavenly is more important than the earthly. God must have those who will serve him efficiently in both. There are those whom we deem eminently qualified to serve him on earth. He deems them more qualified to glory him in heaven. "The Lord hath need of them."

Temporary reverses often occur in the progress of the missionary enterprise. Sometimes long and discouraging labor seems to yield little fruit. A mission-press and translations are consumed by fire, as the Scrampore press in 1812, and the Siamese in 1851. Young men about to go forth to the heathen, well furnished for their work, perish on the eve of their embarkation—crossing, not earth's oceans, but the river of death—as Hampson and Biddle. Men of distinguished adaptation for usefulness have been obliged by feeble health or other circumstances to relinquish their work, and return home to their native land. Are these things without a reason? Oh, no! The Lord has need of them—to teach us our dependence on him, to expand our benevolence, to quicken our zeal, to awaken our anxious concern, to call forth increased endeavors.

A RICH POOR MAN.

One windy afternoon, I went with a friend into a country alms-house. There was sitting before a feeble fire a very aged man, who was deaf, and so shaken with the palsy, that one wooden shoe constantly patted on the brick floor. But deaf, sick, and helpless, it turned out that he was happy. "What are you doing, Wisby?" said my friend. "Waiting, sir." "And for what?" "For the appearing of my Lord." "And what makes you wish for his appearing?" "Because, sir, I expect great things then. He has promised a crown of righteousness to all that love his appearing." And to see whether it was a right foundation on which he rested that glorious hope, we asked old Wisby what it was. By degrees he got on his spectacles, and opening the great Bible beside him, pointed to the text, "Therefore, being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ; by whom also we have access by faith into this grace, wherein we stand, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God."

Though you possess untold wealth, if you have not old Wisby's faith you are a poor man; if you have that faith, and are "rich towards God," count it all joy if you are poor as Lazarus or Wisby in worldly goods. Your inheritance is as sure as God's promise, and as glorious as a throne and a crown can make it. Better have Wisby's hope than Victoria's sceptre, Lazarus' rags than Dives' purple. Better is poverty with piety than riches with perdition. [Heber.

A PRAYER FROM EDWARD VI.'S PRIMER.—Let me neither follow my own will, nor the fancies of other men; neither let me be beguiled with the masque of old customs, long usages, fathers' decrees, ancient laws, nor anything that fighteth with thy holy ordinances and blessed commandments, but faithfully believe and steadfastly confess that to be true godliness which is learned in the Holy Bible, and according unto that to order life, unto the praise of thy holy name.

WHEN I AM OLD.

When I am old—and, O how soon
Will life's sweet morning yield to noon,
And noon's broad, fervid, earnest light
Be shaded in the solemn night!
Till, like a story well nigh-told,
Will seem my life—when I am old.

When I am old, this breezy earth
Will lose for me its voice of mirth—
The streams will have an undertone
Of sadness not by right their own;
And spring's sweet power in vain unfold
In rosy charms—when I am old.

When I am old, I shall not care
To deck with flowers my faded hair;
'T will be no vain desire of mine
In rich and costly dress to shine;
Bright jewels and the brightest gold
Will charm me naught—when I am old.

When I am old, my friends will be
Old, and infirm, and bowed, like me;
Or else, their bodies 'neath the sod,
Their spirits dwelling safe with God,
The old church bell will long have tolled
Above the rest—when I am old.

When I am old, I'd rather bend
Thus sadly o'er each buried friend,
Than see them lose the earnest truth,
That marks the friendship of our youth;
'T will be so sad to have them cold
Or strange to me—when I am old!

When I am old—O how it seems
Like the wild lunacy of dreams,
To picture in prophetic rhyme
That dim, far distant, shadowy time;
So distant that it seems o'er bold
Even to say—"When I am old!"

When I am old?—perhaps ere then
I shall be missed from haunts of men;
Perhaps my dwelling will be found
Beneath the green and quiet mound;
My name by stranger hands enrolled
Among the dead—ere I am old.

Ere I am old?—that time is now,
For youth sits lightly on my brow;
My limbs are firm, and strong, and free,
Life has a thousand charms for me;
Charms that will long their influence hold
Within my heart—ere I am old.

Ere I am old—O let me give
My life to learning how to live!
Then shall I meet with willing heart
An early summons to depart,
Or find my lengthened days consoled
By God's sweet peace—when I am old.

MEMOIR OF ELD. BENNETT.

BY PROF. JOHN H. RAYMOND.

Alfred Bennett was born Sept. 26, 1780, in Mansfield, Windham Co., Connecticut. He was reared a farmer, with no other advantages of education than those furnished by a common country school at that period. But he possessed a native vigor of intellect, which went far to supply the lack of instruction. Of his boyhood we are only informed, that "it was marked by that vivacious, buoyant spirit, which, chastened by grace, was so peculiarly characteristic of him in maturer years," and which was perhaps the most distinctive of his natural traits.

He was converted at the age of eighteen, during a revival in his native town, and continued for several weeks to enjoy a rapturous sense of peace with God, and to labor in the Redeemer's cause with all the ardor of his earnest and energetic nature. He then fell into the sin of unbelief, and remained under a cloud of darkness for several years. Constrained at length by a sense of duty, he was baptized in February, 1800, and united with the Baptist church in Hampton, Conn., under the pastoral care of Rev. Abel Palmer. But it was not till long after, that he gained that abiding peace and bright assurance of hope, which gave such animation to his later religious experience and lit up the evening of his day with such serenity of joy.

In 1803, the twenty-third year of his age, he joined the tide of emigration then pouring into the State of New York, and became a resident of the town of Homer, in Cortland Co., near the center of that State. This is now one of the most beautiful and populous sections of our country; a half century ago it was the far West, and an almost unbroken wilderness. Scattered clearings dotted the luxuriant forest thinly over, while, at wide intervals, the sites of future villages were indicated by little clusters of log huts or rude frame structures—embracing tavern, store, and school-house—the last doing service also, as occasion might require, for church, court-house, town-house and every other public edifice where men do congregate. "In Homer, no house of worship had then been built. The Baptist church, which was then the first of any denomination organized in the town, worshiped in private dwellings; and the Congregational church met in the only frame building in the village, (with one exception,) which was used as a town and school-house. Here Mr. Bennett began life as a farmer."

His mental conflict with respect to engaging in the ministry was protracted and severe, as was not unusual at that period, when God pressed young men into the sacred work under a distressing sense not only of natural insufficiency, but also of defective preparation, and with none of those educational advantages since furnished the youthful ministry by the wise liberality of His people. After two years of extreme agitation and reluctance, Mr. Bennett yielded to his convictions of duty, and was ordained the first pastor of the Homer church in June, 1807.

This pastoral connection was the only one he ever held. It continued a quarter of a century, during which he baptized more than seven hundred and seventy converts, most of them the direct fruit of his own abundant labors. In 1827, the church had grown to such size as to warrant its being separated into three parts, forming the present flourishing churches of Homer, Cortlandville, and McGrawville. His intercourse with his own people and with the community generally, was ever discreet, faithful, pure, and eminently Christian; "and such," says Mr. Harvey, in his funeral discourse, "was the universal respect and affection he inspired, that when at length he deemed it his duty to relinquish the office of pastor, it is believed there was not a single member, either of the church or the congregation, who did not ardently love his ministry and deplore his absence as a personal loss." His home remained in the midst of this attached people, while he had a home on earth; and he now sleeps in the quiet cemetery which he had so largely helped to plant for the resurrection—in death not divided from those to whom his life was bound by such endearing and enduring ties.

It was in the year 1832, that he commenced that career of abundant and effective labor, which has identified his name with the history of Foreign Missions among the American Baptists. Previous to that time, the Board of the Convention had employed but few agents, and those only for occasional and temporary purposes. But their operations had become so extended that a small part of the churches could no longer sustain them; and the interests of the cause, both at home and abroad, required more systematic and comprehensive measures for spreading information over the country, and enlisting the whole denomination in the missionary work. Mr. Bennett was their first permanent agent.

In the fall of 1828 his eldest son had gone as a foreign missionary to Burmah; and about the same time he had begun to render occasional services to the Board by visiting churches and associations, to preach and make collections. He was thus led to a good deal of reflection on the subject of missions; and "as he mused, the fire burned," until (to use his own language) he "found it difficult to turn his attention to any other matter." When therefore the intelligence of his appointment as a permanent traveling agent of the Board reached him, in the spring of 1832, both himself and his people were prepared to recognize the voice of God in the call, and, with whatever regret at the sundering of ties mutually dear, to yield it at once an affirmative response.

This appointment was hailed by all who knew the man, as an augury of happiest aspect. He had now reached the age of fifty-two, and entered the field in the full maturity of his powers, ripe in experience as a man, a Christian, and a minister, with an established reputation for piety, prudence, integrity, stability, and enlarged philanthropy, and a heart wedded to the cause, to which his life was thenceforth to be devoted. He took hold of the work "at its heavy end;" and he adhered to it with unabating diligence, fidelity, and zeal. Our Missionary Reports for the last twenty years contain each some record of his labors, continued with scarcely any interruptions from sickness or other causes to the close of his life. His travels, extending from New England westward to the Mississippi, through all the Middle and a portion of the Southern States, and performed mostly before the present facilities of communication had begun to exist, were attended with much fatigue and danger, and put to a severe test the firmness of a constitution unusually sound and vigorous. In the Baptist churches throughout this extended territory, his stalwart figure and benevolent features have long formed a familiar and beloved object; and with sorrow for the immeasurable public loss occasioned by his death, thousands have mingled tears of personal regret, "sorrowing most of all that they shall behold his face no more."

It is impossible to estimate the amount of funds, (unquestionably very large,) brought by his agency into the foreign mission treasury. But he rendered a far more important service by the correction of errors, the removal of prejudice, the spread of information, and the kindling of a missionary spirit in large sections of the church, where just that kind of work was needed. At the time of his appointment, a stern and active prejudice against the very principle of missions prevailed among the Baptists of the South and West. It by no means indicated in all cases the absence of a philanthropic and Christian spirit, but more frequently sprung from sincere though misguided anxiety for the honor of the Holy Spirit in the conversion of men. It required a truly apostolic temper, much charity and patience, prudence and tact, much knowledge of men and of the Bible, much, in short, of that benign and comprehensive wisdom "that cometh from above," to deal with such materials. These brethren were not to be refuted, silenced, humbled—that were comparatively easy—but to be gained; gained to the mission cause; changed from conscientious and therefore determined opponents, to enlightened, cordial and active friends.

Mr. Bennett well understood the character of the field. At the outset he apprised the Board, that "he should deem the raising of money a secondary matter, and make it his first concern to spread information and overcome prejudice." To this purpose he steadily adhered. His manner of presenting the claims of the enterprise, in many respects a model, was especially adapted to disarm hostility, and to conciliate the confidence of the truly Christian heart. It was exhibited in his preaching, not as a novel movement, illustrating the wisdom of the present as compared with former ages, but as a simple return to the spirit and the letter of the Great Commission; not as binding the conscience on the principle of a stern, compulsive legality, but as engaging and showing forth the renewed heart, like every other genuine expression of love to Christ, and of love for His sake to dying men. It was advocated, not by formal reasonings, but by well attested facts, and by earnest and pungent appeals, which sprung from a heart warm with holy and humane affections, and made their way at once to every kindred spirit. At the same time, the Christian simplicity which marked his demeanor and conversion, his readiness to answer every sincere inquiry, his patience in resolving difficulties and removing misapprehensions, and that remarkable look and bearing of transparent honesty—which no art could counterfeit—were a guaranty to multitudes, on whom argument would have been lost, of the integrity and trustworthiness of the society which he represented.

His success was complete. Not only individuals, but churches, associations, and the entire denomination in large sections, which had previously stood aloof or actively opposed the missions, were changed from foes to friends, and swelled the sacramental host that fought under Christ's banner for the conquest of the world. The value of such a service cannot be estimated. The seed sown bore fruit not only, but seed in the fruit; which, self-preserved, and self-disseminated, will be reproduced in successive harvests, each richer than its antecedent, until the end of time. Every year must make more evident the value of his agency. The day which consummates all things will complete the returns, and reveal the entire amount of his usefulness to the church and the world.

He had spent nearly twenty years in this arduous service, during which period he had seen most of his youthful associates fall around him; and still "his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated." But in the spring of 1850, as he approached that age at which the Scriptures fix the natural limit of human life, he received sudden but unmistakable intimations that the time of his departure was near. The progress of his disease was steady, though not rapid. It was attended with indescribably acute and long protracted sufferings, which were not merely borne with patience, but conquered through faith. "Why," he asked, "should the course of nature be turned aside to save me a few pangs? Why wish the way of God altered? It might—so complex are God's plans—cause lasting injury to thousands, to save me a short period of pain. God's plan is all right; I would sink into His will." There was nothing artificial, nothing unhealthy in his state of mind. There were no raptures of enthusiastic joy, but a clear discernment of the foundation of his hope, a serene, unfaltering trust, a realization of his unseen inheritance—a taking hold of God and heaven. He often called for the singing of hymns. "I expect," said he, "soon to be where there will be much singing, and I would fain hear a little now." As his end drew near, he remarked to his pastor: "The world is receding, and I am glad of it. I leave it as one would some unpleasant company with which he has been compelled for a time to mingle. The society above looks infinitely more precious." When too weak to converse, he was wont to reply to the inquiries of friends: "Peace"—"all clear—not a cloud, not a shade." And in this state he continued (says Mr. Harvey) till, on the morning of May 10, 1851, in the seventy-first year of his age, his body sunk peacefully in death, and the "chariot of fire and horses of fire," ascending, bore him from our sight.

TWO SUNDAYS COMING TOGETHER.

When the first English missionaries went to Tahiti, they passed round the Cape of Good Hope, to the east; and the American missionaries to Hawaii passed round Cape Horn, to the west. As a necessary consequence, there is between them the difference of one day and one night, in the reckoning of time. And hence, for thirty years there has existed, and still exists, in the Pacific Ocean, this singular fact—two groups of islands, lying in nearly the same degree of longitude, and no farther apart than New York and London, and yet their inhabitants, who are Christianized, observing the Sabbath on different days of the week. This singular fact may be explained, even to the comprehension of children. The most of our young readers are sufficiently acquainted with astronomical geography to know that the succession of day and night is caused by the apparent revolution of the sun from east to west, or the actual revolution of the earth on its own axis, from west to east. If, then, a person should set out and travel entirely around the world, in the same direction with the earth's motion, he would gain one apparent revolution of the sun, or exactly one day and night. Or, if he should go in the opposite direction, or with the sun, he would lose one apparent revolution of the sun, or one day and night. Therefore, if two persons should travel around the earth, in opposite directions, when they met at the point they started from, they would differ exactly two days in their reckoning of time; the one being one day ahead, and the other one day behind the reckoning of those who had remained stationary in the place. Or, if they had met on the other side of the globe, and compared notes, they would have differed one day; the one having gained, and the other having lost, just half a revolution of the earth on its axis.

This consideration fully explains the above remarkable fact, now existing in the evangelized islands of the Pacific Ocean. If you should go west to the Sandwich Islands, you find them keeping the Sabbath on the same day with yourselves. If, then, you should pass almost directly south, to the Society Islands, you would find that their Sabbath had occurred the day before yours. Or, if you go from here east, and stop first at the Society Islands, you would find them keeping Sabbath on the same day with yourselves. Then pass north to the Sandwich Islands, their Sabbath would occur the day after yours.

A GOOD ACTION.—Three things enter into the composition of a good action, scripturally so considered; these are a right principle, a right rule, and a right end.

The right principle is the love of God.	2 Cor. v. 14, 15.
The right rule is the Word of God.	2 Tim. iii. 16, 17.
The right end is the Glory of God.	1 Cor. x. 31.

"My grace is sufficient." "As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me." "He that saith he abideth in Him, ought himself also so to walk, even as He walked."

Be all my heart, be all my days,	1 Thess. v. 33.
Devoted to thy single praise;	Col. i. 10.
And let my glad obedience prove,	John xiv. 21.
How much I owe, how much I love.	2 Cor. viii. 9.

FORGIVENESS.—My heart was heavy, for its trust had been abused, its kindness answered with foul wrong; so, turning gloomily from my fellow men, one summer Sabbath day, I strolled among the green mounds of the village burial place, where, pondering how all human love and hate find one sad level, and how, soon or late, wronged and wrong doer, each with meekened face and cold hands folded over a still heart, pass the green threshold of our common grave, whither all footsteps tend, whence none depart. Awed for myself, and pitying my race, our common sorrow like a mighty wave swept all my pride away, and trembling, I forgave. [J. G. Whittier.

SUNDAY LEGISLATION.

In the New York Daily Tribune of Thursday last, an infidel insists upon his right to "gun, fish, travel, or indulge in what is termed unlawful exercises or pastimes on Sunday;" and the Tribune, on the other hand, "upholds and justifies our existing Sunday laws, in so far as they are necessary to secure the stillness, repose, and incitements to meditation, which are essential to the use and enjoyment of that day in the manner which the great majority deem appropriate and desirable." The Tribune also thinks, "that it is expedient and conducive to health, vigor, longevity, as well as to moral and intellectual well-being, that a fixed portion of time (one day in seven) should be set apart for bodily rest and spiritual improvement;" and that, "if we are to have a stated day of rest, the day reverenced by a very large majority of our people should be chosen for this purpose."

Without undertaking to apologize for that lack of neighborly kindness which leads some to disturb unnecessarily the quiet of others, we insist that the real merits of this question are not understood. Most unfortunately for the cause of truth, the infidel never discusses it without betraying at the same time his opposition to the Christian religion, which not only does no good, but creates a suspicion that his objection to the Sunday laws arises more from his hatred of sacred things than from any concern about human rights. What the real motive of the infidel may be, we do not pretend to judge; but as we are not compelled to be uncharitable, we take it for granted that he sees, or thinks he sees, in the Sunday statute, a violation of that great principle of our government which proclaims equality of human rights. But be that as it may, we beg leave to offer a few words upon the subject as viewed from the stand-point which we occupy.

We are among those who believe that governments were ordained by God, not for the purpose of enacting and enforcing such laws as might seem best to wicked men, but rather to execute such laws as have already received the sanction of the God of righteousness; or, (to express our meaning with more precision,) to embody in legal enactments those principles of righteousness which God has revealed in his word. No government can make that law binding, which is in itself wrong; and the political casuistry which teaches obedience to a Fugitive Slave Bill, or any other statute recognizing the right of one man to oppress another, challenges none of our admiration. "The throne of iniquity, which frameth mischief by a law," is cursed; and God's people cannot bow to it, and be guiltless. We are therefore far from being infidels, and far from wishing that infidelity may have any controlling influence upon a government under which we live. On the contrary, we rejoice that the righteousness of the Bible has been honored as much as it has in the laws and institutions of our country.

But while legislators should regard themselves as merely the executors of God's will, they should be cautious lest they undertake to execute what is not his will; or rather, what it is not his will that they should execute. For though it may be a person's duty to perform this or that act, it may not be God's will that government should interfere to force him to do it. For instance, it may be my duty to pray in my family, or to submit to the ordinance of baptism, or to contribute of my substance for the support of the ministry; but it is not within the legitimate province of government to compel me to such things. It is a sophistry of the grossest kind, which infers, from the fact that government is the instituted agency for carrying into execution God's will, that such duties are to be enforced by the civil magistrate.

Nothing can be clearer than that God's will respects man in his immediate relation to his Maker, and man in his relation to his fellow creatures. It is quite as clear, that civil government is rightfully concerned with this latter relation only. There never was any government, except the Hebrew commonwealth, which had a God-given authority to execute or enforce the duties of the former relation. And when we hear—as we so often do—the example of that government pleaded in justification of certain kinds of legislation, which the governments of this day have no business to engage in, we could wish that the authors of such a plea understood the Bible doctrine of human rights a little better. That government did, indeed, legislate as to certain duties which were owing by the Hebrews directly to their God. But while it did so, the presence of inspired prophets and the oracular responses, from the Holy Ark, which was God's Throne, precluded the possibility of mistake. Conscience was in no danger of being oppressed, because the true and infallible guide for conscience was found in the government itself. Besides, all that kind of legislation had a typical import, which was fully answered by the introduction of the New Dispensation.

As civil government is now rightfully concerned only with those duties which man owes to his fellow man, we put it to the sober judgment of all good men and true, whether the observance of a Sabbath is one of them. It may be a very wicked thing in me not to keep a Sabbath; but if so, it is a sin against God, and not against my neighbor. If the sin which one man commits does not deprive another of his just rights, government has no business to interfere. If one man steals, it is very clear that some other man is deprived of that which rightfully belongs to him. If he commits murder, some one is robbed of his right to life. If he utters slanderous words, some one else is robbed of his right to a good character. These, therefore, are cases in which government has an unqualified right to interpose. But if one man chooses to break the Sabbath, does that compel any body else to do so? Does it necessarily deprive another of the right to keep the Sabbath? For aught we can see, this is a duty which stands precisely on a level with that other duty of the divine law, which prohibits the worship of any other God but Jehovah. But if A. chooses to worship Jupiter, or Guadama, or even to be an Athiest and worship no god at all, does that hinder B. from worshiping the God of Israel?

We think, therefore, that all this Sunday legislation is extrinsic to the proper business of civil government. A congregation assembled for worship, undoubtedly, has a right to be protected from rude and wanton disturbance. But this protection it is justly entitled to on any day of the week. Why, in the name of reason, is it more entitled to this kind of protection on Sunday, than if it choose to hold its meetings on Saturday? The Seventh-day Baptist congregation of this city assembles every week amid the rattling of carts, the clangor of fish horns, the music of street organs, and a general medley of discordant sounds; but police officers have yet to register the first note of complaint on this account. The Jews convene in their synagogues, every Saturday, under like circumstances; but nobody ever thinks that they are entitled to any thing better. But why this mighty difference? Why must we almost walk on tiptoe, on the first day of the week, lest we disturb the sensibilities of our popular worshiping assemblies, while, on the seventh day, people may prosecute their noisy business as usual?

But people have a right to the stillness of the Sabbath, it is said. Well, if this is a good rule, it will work both ways. Those who observe the seventh day of the week are entitled to the stillness of the Sabbath. But suppose we go to the Legislature with this plea, asking that others may be compelled to cease work, and whatever else may create a noise, that we may have "the stillness, repose, and incitements to meditation, which are essential to the use and enjoyment of the day in the manner which" we "deem appropriate and desirable." In such case, we should very probably be told, that we were entitled to all "the stillness, repose, and incitements to meditation," which we could secure without depriving others of their rights. If we ask that the blacksmith, whose shop is hard by our house of worship, be compelled to stop the sound of his hammer and anvil, our lawmakers will reply, 'No, gentlemen, that blacksmith has a right to the profit of his day's labor; and however you may be entitled to the stillness of the Sabbath, you have no right to secure it by depriving him of his labor.' Now, truly, we see no reason why this principle should not be as applicable to others as to ourselves. Does it alter the case, because your bull has gored my ox?

"Ah, but you are a small minority, and you must give up to the majority." Give up what? Our right to the profits of our labor? Yes, that is in reality what the objection amounts to. But if our neighbors are entitled to the avails of six days labor every week, so are we. If their blacksmith has a right to swing his hammer from Monday morning till Saturday night, ours has a right to swing his from Sunday morning till Friday night. If our hammer disturbs them, their hammer disturbs us. We contend that human rights are equal; and we desire to see blotted from the statute book those laws which destroy this equality. The Sunday laws do destroy this equality. If those who enact them, and thus deprive us of an equal chance with our neighbors, would make some reparation for the loss to which we are subjected, it would be nothing more than common justice. If a railroad is run through a man's farm, he is paid for the damage he sustains. But civil legislation compels the observers of the seventh day of the week to stop their business on Sunday, or else to pursue it in such a quiet way as not to wound the sensibilities of those who choose to consider the day holy; by reason of which restriction they cannot compete with their first-day neighbors in business. But did any body ever propose to remunerate them for this loss?

In sober truth, we consider it but little better than an insult to be told of our duty to yield, in this respect, to the majority. What! has our equality with others, in respect to rights, been destroyed by our presuming to differ from them in a matter of religion? Did our forefathers bleed to secure this boon for themselves and their children, and shall we their descendants be deprived of it? We can never yield this point. We feel that our rights are as sacred as those of the majority, and we mean to contend for them till the majority feel it too.

The truth is—and there is no denying the fact with decency—that the Sunday laws were originally enacted, not for the purpose of protecting religious people in their just rights, but to restain others from what was supposed to be sin against God. The Puritan colonists supposed themselves divinely authorized to restrain men, not only from Sabbath-breaking, but from blasphemy and idolatry; in short, from every thing which, in the light of the Bible, could be construed as sin against the Most High. Roger Williams ventured to propound another doctrine, saying that civil government had no proper concern in the duties of the first table of the Law; in consequence of which Puritan Massachusetts was no home for him. He had to find other quarters. Of late, clerical sophistry and legal ingenuity have conspired together to blind the eyes of the people to the fact that the Sunday statute rests upon religious grounds, endeavoring to make it appear that it is purely a civil regulation, having respect only to good order and the morals of the community. But the unsophisticated conscience decides differently. Were it not for its supposed bearing upon the interests of religion, neither legislators nor clergy would ask for its continuance a single day. That the observance of a Sabbath conduces to good order and good morals, will not generally be denied. But so does the ministry of the gospel. Shall the State provide by law for the support of the ministry? So does prayer. Shall the State enforce the duty? So does every religious observance. Shall the State provide for the administration of religious ordinances?

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Illustrations of Popery—Opium Eating in England.

GLASGOW, March 12th, 1852.

Accounts from Madrid of the 3d instant bring no more important information than that "the Pope's Nuncio presented on that day to the Queen the Baby Linen blessed by his Holiness"—as the intimation misnames the head of the great apostacy at Rome. We are not, however, informed what effect the farce is expected to produce; but if the baby should prove naughty, we presume the blessing could be washed out—as the very priestly anointing was scraped from the fingers of the intended assassin of its mother, before he was garroted! It is to prepare the priesthood who teach this folly for the work of deceiving, that our Government pays largely for the College of Maynooth! It can hardly excite wonder, therefore, that numerous meetings throughout the country are lifting up their protest against a continuance of the iniquity. But in the face of such protests, they openly set the recently-passed law at defiance; while in Ireland it is proved in courts of law, that men so educated at the country's expense denounce at their altars those unfriendly to their tyranny, and burn the Bibles (and that publicly) given to their people by those who desire to instruct them truly in the ways of God. Nay, not content with the power for evil which they possess over those who voluntarily subject themselves to it, they clamor loudly now for power over others. The Universe in Paris, and the Rambler in London, are tending to convince those who imagined Popery to be changed, that they have been greatly mistaken. The London Popish organ which we have named, lately said, "Religious liberty, in the sense of a liberty possessed by every man to choose his own religion, is one of the most wicked delusions ever foisted upon this age by the father of all deceit. The very name of liberty, except in the sense of a permission to do certain definite acts, ought to be banished from the domain of religion." "It is neither more nor less than a falshood. No man has a right to choose his religion." "None but an atheist can uphold the principle of religious liberty." Of the Protestant this writer asks, "Shall I tempt him to forget that he has no more right to his religious views than he has to my purse, or my house, or my life-blood?" This is indeed a bold assertion to make in London in the present day, but it is quite consistent with what Popery has been accustomed to maintain, and to practice too, as often as opportunity has been afforded. But surely those who think that they not only have right but are bound to receive God's truth and to reject man's falsehood, had need to ponder whether it be wise to extend the power of such a system by their own immediate agency. Lord John Russell, it was understood, was determined not to countenance the demanded revocation of the large sum paid to Maynooth, and was giving countenance to Popery in other forms. We have noticed formerly an alledged grant of £200 towards the building of one of their chapels at Greenwich; it was, however, stated to have been only £50, which the Board of Admiralty considered themselves justified in giving in consequence of the number of Papists among the Greenwich pensioners.

The Popish Archbishop of Dublin has died lately; and it is expected that his successor may be more Popish than he has been. He was rather unfavorable to the high-handed measures of the Pope relative to the Thurles Decrees as to the Government Irish Colleges. A few of the priesthood regarded it as impolitic to lay a ban on the professors and students of their persuasion from having connection with these Universities. The Pope, however, decided that it must be so. One only, we believe, of the priests who held office, the Rev. Dr. O'Toole, Vice President of the Galway College, refused then to resign until the result of an appeal now made to the Vatican should be ascertained. There is reason to fear that the Papal priesthood are conniving at the cool atrocities of the Ribbon Conspirators, who throughout Ireland are rendering the life of all unsafe. Whether the new Government will take more effective measures or be more successful than their predecessors, we can yet scarcely dare to form an opinion. Looking, however, at the fact that a number of its members are known Tractarians, (which means more than half Papists,) we are not without fears. Since their accession to power, and possibly in consequence of it, the Popish newspaper, The Glasgow Free Press, has resumed appearence, after an interval of two weeks. Their activity at the present time is great, and their resources seem increasing. On the Continent of Europe generally, this seems equally the case; but in Switzerland, the Grand Council of the Canton Soleure has charged the Council of State to present a report, limiting the number of noviciates in convents—suppressing the right of religious establishmens to certain emoluments—imposing a tax on such establishments—and taking an inventory of all ecclesiastical property.

I have formerly noticed an increasing use of opium in this country. From a paper presented to the House of Commons lately, it appears that the imports of this article for home and foreign consumption during last year were 106,113 cwts. The home consumption in 1851 was 50,368 lbs, while in 1850 it was only 42,324 lbs. "It would therefore appear," it is remarked, "that there is some truth in the report that as dram-drinking decreases opium-eating increases." J. A. BEGG.

THE REVIVAL AT ADAMS.

The readers of the Recorder will be interested to learn, even at this late hour, that God has poured out his Spirit upon the church in Adams, N. Y., and that a very encouraging revival of religion has been the result. Agreeable to an invitation extended to him last summer, Eld. A. B. Burdick, of Westerly, R. I., visited Adams about the middle of last December, for the purpose of holding a series of meetings. At first the prospect was discouraging in the extreme; but all-prevailing prayer moved the arm that moves the world. The very elements appeared to have combined in a league against the advancement of the cause of truth and salvation. For seven or eight weeks the people toiled through storms and snow-drifts, with almost inconceivable faithfulness. But God was with them. About thirty were converted to God, nearly all of whom have united with the church. Among the converts are numbered some of our most influential citizens. The history of the meeting of last winter will form a bright page in that of the church, and will not soon be forgotten by the lovers of Zion. If a victory is estimated by the strength of the foe overcome, this is a great one; and we may well say, "What hath God wrought!" Bro. Burdick, by his faithfulness and zeal, has endeared himself to all the lovers of truth and holiness in the place; and whilst the meeting of last winter is remembered, he will not be forgotten. May God reward him, and follow him with his blessings.

JAS. SUMMERBELL.

A TRIBUTE TO THE MEMORY OF BARBARA KEIPER.

DIED, on the 16th of March, in the Sister's House, at Ephrata, BARBARA KEIPER, 80 years of age.

Sister Bevely, as she was always called, was the last of the Sisterhood of the former régime at that Institution, and a right worthy sister she proved herself. She made a profession of religion and entered the Sister's House in the sixteenth year of her age, and has scarcely been off the ground in all that time, save to attend a Love-Feast, in Franklin County, occasionally. She was distinguished for her great simplicity of heart and honesty of character. Perhaps no person, of any age or any country, knew less of the world, or kept herself from becoming contaminated by its vices, more than our plain, unsophisticated old sister. It is not saying too much to add, that a purer heart, a more cheerful spirit, an humbler mind, and a more conscientious soul, never animated the breast of any of the sons and daughters of our fallen race.

Sister Keiper belonged to two eras, and was the connecting link between the two economies of Ephrata—the first economy, embracing community of interest and celibacy, under a modified monastic government; the second, the present, securing equal privileges to all the members of the Society, single and married, in needy circumstances, to share in the interest of the Estate—have house-room, wood, flour, &c., supplied, (in sickness and decay, full support is afforded to them,) and they are left to pursue whatsoever avocation they may, themselves, elect to aid in their own maintenance; and herein sister Bevely exhibited one of the most self-denying and ennobling traits ever manifested by woman, and especially one who had spent the vigor of her days in hard labor for the benefit of others, and that at a period of life when she might look for more ease and rest. By virtue of the then existing Constitution, she would be entitled to the whole income of that beautiful and productive property, with one to two thousand dollars yearly, but she generously yielded her claims as the last sister of the Old Sisterhood, and threw in her lot with the remnant of the aged and infirm, the young and the hardy, who resorted thither to strengthen their hands, and went to work, again, at the slow employment of knitting gloves and stockings to support herself; an instance of self-denial and sacrifice rarely equaled in these degenerate days. It was Bevely's privilege to minister to the sufferings and the infirmities, and to close the eyes of the last sixteen sisters of the old institution, as their flickering lives, one by one, went out, (generally at advanced age,) until she was left alone, bereft of all her early companions, who set themselves apart, at that period, to bear witness to the Truth, and to preserve the primitive belief and worship, in their retirement from the turmoils of the world. During the whole period of sixty-four years, she maintained her holy profession, as a good hand-maiden, unimpeached for a single delinquency, and unreproached for the slightest foible. She loved the law of God with her whole heart, and meditated day and night on His statutes and His commandments. Her home was, emphatically, the sanctuary, and her chief delight, to hymn the praises of her Maker. Hundreds, nay thousands, who have visited the old "Saals" of Ephrata, will recall, with every recollection of that place, the animation and earnestness of Bevely, in reading to them the numerous inscriptions of passages of Scripture and verses of hymns, done in singular chirography—"fractur schriften"—which cover the walls of the old buildings, as well as remember her zeal to impress those lessons on the minds of the thoughtless throng who resort to that ancient spot from mere motives of curiosity. She was always ready for every good work, to show her faith and patient endurance for the Redeemer's sake, and ever commended her religion to all persons, by her consistent walk and conversation, and particularly by her unreserved, though not obtrusive, communications of perfect confidence in Him who led her and sustained her in her solitude, and vouchsafed unto her such a measure of submission and contentment, under all His dealings with her, during all the vicissitudes and persecutions they had to encounter. Her faith was a vital, a living faith; and no one lived more by faith than did Bevely. How often and how profitably has the writer lingered in the dark passages of the old Cloister, as he passed along its narrow aisles, at even-tide, to listen to the devout lispings of that pure and faithful disciple, as she repeated, nightly, her favorite metrical prayer:—

> "Ich lege mich in Jesu wunden,
> Wann ich mich leg zu meiner Ruh,
> Ich bleib in Schlaf mit Ihm verbunden,
> Er drücket mir die Augen zu;
> Ich fürchte nicht die finstre Nacht
> Weil Jesus um mein Bette wacht.
>
> * * * * * *
>
> Lass Deinen Engel bey mir bleiben,
> Und immerum mein Bette stehn,
> Lass ihn das unglück von mir treiben,
> Auf mich und alle Frommen sehn;
> So Schlaf ich Sanft in Gottes Hut,
> Der auf im Schlaf mir gutes thut."

Such faith gives us higher and holier views of our calling, as professors of the religion of the Cross—higher and holier because so child like; and such simplicity of heart and such unreserved confidence in our Great High Priest cannot fail to render us better, and secure unto us the most inestimable gifts of our kind Parent on high, who is much more willing to bestow favors than we are to ask for them in a child-like manner.

Sister Bevely's latter years were years of affliction, and the last several months of her existence were months of much bodily suffering, yet, through Grace Divine, she possessed her soul in much patience, and could triumph amid all her agony, for she knew, experimentally, that her "Redeemer liveth," and that where He is there should she also be. She was blessed with the presence of her Lord and Master, in whom she believed with a firm unwavering faith, and although she was the last of the Old Sisterhood, yet she had the unceasing attentions of the Sisters under the new economy, some of whom occupy the old establishment, and likewise the kind offices of their aged and beloved Pastor, the Senior Elder of the Society, who now resides at Ephrata, and the tender sympathies of every person in the vicinity; for no being, in any community, could be more respected and more cherished than good old Bevely.

THE "FOREKNOWLEDGE" DISCUSSION.

In the Recorder of March 25, is an article characteristically frank and courteous in reply to my note of March 18, in which, as a reason why the discussion on "Foreknowledge" should be circumscribed, the following passage occurs:—

"We are satisfied that the majority of them [the readers of the Recorder] have no taste for metaphysical discussions, and from intimations repeatedly given from different sources, it was apparent that we were regarded as being engaged in unprofitable speculations."

From this it appears that several individuals have interested themselves to interfere with this matter. Very well; let me tell them, in kindness, that on the other side there were some persons deeply interested in the discussion, and desired its continuance, under suitable restraints, which it was believed the good sense of those engaged in it would develop. It is feared that the censorship proposed will hardly be acquiesced in with "free good will."

Thanking Bro. B. for his magnanimous offer, I feel constrained to decline its acceptance, for the reason that I cannot consent to occupy any portion of the columns of the Recorder under such humiliating circumstances. I hardly feel prepared to occupy the position of beggar at the door of our denominational paper. I have fought too many a well-set battle in its defense for such an end.

In taking my leave of the readers of the Recorder, I wish to state, that my principles on this subject are free inquiry, free thought, and free discussion, coolly and kindly conducted; and I hope to see the day when those like minded with myself will not be under the necessity of seeking other sources of communication with the public mind than such as are controlled by Seventh-day Baptists.

ALFRED CENTER, March 25, 1852.

LARGE BEQUESTS.—Ephraim Holbrook, Esq., died suddenly in New York some two weeks ago, leaving the following legacies to various public institutions in this city:—

N. Y. Ass'n for Improving Condition of Poor,	$10,000
N. Y. Inst. for Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb,	10,000
N. Y. Institution for the Blind,	10,000
N. Y. Protestant Orphan Asylum,	6,000
N. Y. Protestant Half Orphan Asylum,	4,000
N. Y. Prot. Epis. City Mission Society,	4,000
American Bible Society,	3,000
American Home Missionary Society,	4,000
American Sunday-School Union,	2,000
New York Marine Bible Society,	2,000
N. Y. Bible and Common Prayer Book Society,	2,000
N. Y. Prot. Epis. Sunday-School Union Society,	2,000
N. Y. Prot. Epis. Tract Society,	1,000
N. Y. Sabbath Tract Society,	1,000
American Tract Society,	2,000
Soc. for Education of Poor Young Men for the Ministry in the Prot. Epis. Church,	2,000
American Seaman's Friend Society,	2,000
Board of Education of N. Y., to purchase books for Library of Free Academy of City of N. Y.	5,000
N. Y. House and School of Industry,	3,000
American Female Guardian Society,	2,000
Demilt Dispensary,	5,000
Total,	$80,000

In addition to these bequests, he leaves $250 to each Ward School in the City above the grade of Primary Schools, which is to be expended in the purchase of books for libraries. The following Societies are made residuary legatees: The New York Association for the Improvement of the Condition of the Poor; the New York Institution for the Blind; the New York Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb; the American Home Missionary Society; the New York Protestant Orphan Asylum.

UNION ACADEMY, SHILOH, N. J.

The progress of this Institution has thus far been satisfactory to its supporters. The Principal and Preceptress have been very assiduous and pains-taking in their labors. The order and advancement of their classes have given proof of their ability and worth for the station which they occupy.

Prof. Gurdon Evans has been with us about eight weeks. His lectures on Agricultural Chemistry, his analysis of soils, and the daily instruction of a class in this science, have contributed much, very much, in behalf of the cause of education in this community.

The Exercises of the Rhetorical Classes for the winter term, took place in the Seventh-day Baptist meeting-house, on the evening of March 23d. They were all of a deeply interesting nature, and were listened to with marked attention by a large audience. Indeed, these exercises were a feast of fat things, served out to the audience with a tone and sentiment that bespoke the onward march of intelligence, based upon religious principle. The essays by the ladies, and the orations by the gentlemen, did honor to the heads and hearts of the authors. The fluency and ease of the delivery of the Greek oration was indicative of the classic mind of the youthful speaker. The oration on Non-Intervention was truly a message of peace and good will, speaking lessons of humanity and life to all, but cruelty and death to none—no, not even to our enemies. The essay, "Where shall my Spirit go?" might well claim serious after-thought. The "Good-Bye" touched tender cords, whose vibrations were felt by many, especially by the members of the School. The singing by the students, conducted by Bro. Joel C. West, was performed in a spirited and excellent style.

The next term of the Academy commences Fourth-day, the 31st inst. It is the ardent wish and prayer of not a few, that all our people in this part of the State may soon become really identified in its behalf. Friends, brethren, and sisters! it is for your interest, that of your children, and of the cause of God, that we solicit your liberal patronage.

CURIOUS LOTTERY CASE.—Several years ago, an institution called the American Art-Union was established in the city of New York, for the purpose of encouraging art by the purchase and gratuitous exhibition of pictures, statues, &c. Five dollars a year secured membership; and the money went to purchase works of art, which, after being exhibited for several months, were distributed among the members by lot. A few months since, James Gordon Bennett, of the N. Y. Herald, published some criticism upon the manner in which the large income of the institution was expended; and for this its officers had him indicted as a libeler. When the case came to trial, the indictment was quashed, and it was held that the Art-Union was an illegal institution—that it was, in fact, a lottery. Hereupon Bennett bought a ticket of a person who was a member, by the aid of which he obtained an injunction prohibiting the officers of the Art-Union from exercising their usual rights of drawing by lot for works of art, for the purposes designed under the constitution. A motion to dissolve this injunction was argued before the Supreme Court last week; and Judge Duer decided to dissolve the injunction, on the ground that the plaintiff in this case had no personal interest in such property, and consequently no right of action. The question of the legality of the institution has not yet been decided.

REVIVAL IN STONINGTON, CT.—The Christian Secretary says: An interesting work of grace in the Baptist church, Stonington, under the pastoral care of Rev. A. G. Palmer, has been in progress for more than two months. Meetings were commenced the first Monday in January, and have been continued every evening until the present time. A goodly number have found the Saviour, and have been buried with Him in baptism. At the last communion, 18 were received to the church, the converts varying from 12 to 70 years. The work has spread itself into the Congregational church.

DEATH OF A PERSECUTOR.—The death of the Queen of Madagascar is announced in late foreign papers. She died last November, after the defeat of her army in a contest with a belligerent chief. The youthful prince, her successor, has for some years past been the friend and defender of the persecuted Christians.

A Wesleyan Minister in China.—The Wesleyan Missionary Notices for the month, state that George Piercy, a young local preacher, who felt constrained by the love of Christ to labor in China, and who proceeded at his own expense, in the autumn of 1850, has been welcomed at Hong Kong by the British soldiers there, has mastered the Chinese language so as to be able to speak it fluently, has established a school and a society consisting of about twenty members, has procured a little chapel capable of holding sixty persons, and has every reason to believe, that under God, his efforts among the people will be abundantly blessed.

The Jews in Paris.—The London Times says that the Jews of Paris, headed by MM. de Rothschild, and other distinguished persons of the sect, have just established a society at Paris for the study and propagation of the sacred sciences. Rooms have been taken, in which religious instruction is given gratuitously to young men destined for the priesthood, and in which Jews of all classes assemble to pray and hear religious books read. A rabbi is attached to the establishment, and every Sunday M. Albert Cohen, a distinguished Oriental scholar, reads and explains passages from the Fathers of the Synagogue.

Editorial Apology.—One of the veterans of the editorial host thus soothes a correspondent who inquires what had become of his communication:—

"We laid it aside for revision and correction, as we are repeatedly compelled to do with communications received by us. They need more correction than we are able to bestow upon them at the time of their reception, and they are laid aside for a season of more leisure; and from the press of other articles sent to us properly prepared, and our daily editorial cares, they are sometimes overlooked until they become too stale for publication; some do not spoil by keeping, and are sent out months after their reception."

SECOND-DAY, MARCH 22.

In the Senate, an unusually large number of petitions were presented, relating mostly to the standing topics of petition. The private bills ordered engrossed on Sixth-day, were taken up and passed. Mr. Gwin, from the Naval Committe, reported back all the memorials asking contracts for carrying the mail between the United States and Ireland, Africa, Genoa, Spain, South America, China, &c., and moved to be discharged from any further consideration of the subject; which motion was agreed to. Mr. Seward's resolution calling for an estimate of the expense of reconnoisance of the Northern and China Seas, was adopted. The Non-Intervention Resolutions were then taken up, and Senator Soule made a long and eloquent speech upon them. He took strong ground in favor of a watchful and interested course by this nation toward all others; that we should not stand idly by while other Governments were violating national laws and human rights, &c. The fame of the eloquent speaker drew a large audience.

In the House, the Homestead Bill was laid over until Third-day next. Mr. Johnson pronounced the differences between Messrs. Dunham and Fitch amicably adjusted. The Deficiency Bill was debated in Committee of the Whole, and several retrenchment amendments were voted down. Mr. Houston, of Alabama, was very severe upon army prices. Near the close of the session, an attempt was made to "save the Union" by offering a motion declaring the "binding efficacy of the Compromise Acts," and calling the previous question thereon. The House adjourned, however, without a special vote.

THIRD-DAY, MARCH 23.

In the Senate, among the numerous petitions presented was one by Mr. Seward from C. Hanson, of Brooklyn, New York, who proposes to Congress to help him establish a line of steamers between Brooklyn and Gluckstadt, on the Elbe, and near to Hamburg, so as to make semi-monthly passages between Brooklyn and the city of Hamburg. The remainder of the day was spent on Territorial Judges and a dry dock for California.

In the House, the Deficiency Bill was discussed, and in the progress of the discussion, the extravagance and corruption connected with the army were severely commented upon. Mr. Gorman commented on the fact that the cost of maintaining each soldier in 1845 was four hundred and four dollars. Now it is one thousand dollars a man. There are corruptions in the Departments. Officers are in partnership with men who sell horses, and thus fleece the Government. He said he knew of one officer, who, after defrauding Government of $100,000, has settled down independently and at a ease in Oregon.

FOURTH-DAY, MARCH 24.

In the Senate, Mr. Clarke presented a petition of the grand-son of Gen. Nathaniel Greene, in whose hands are papers and writings of his ancestor, which he proposes to publish, with an accurate history of the events of his life, and he asks Congress to subscribe for a sufficient number of copies of justify their publication. Numerous other petitions were presented, among which was one for cheap ocean postage, one from the N. Y. State Agricultural Society in favor of an Agricultural Bureau, and several in favor of aid the to Collins Line of Steamers. A resolution was adopted calling upon the President for information relative to the plans for an extension of the Capitol. Mr. Hale gave notice of an early call for action on the resolution declaring the finality of the Compromise. At 3 o'clock the Senate went into executive session.

The House spent the whole day in talking about the Deficiency Bill.

FIFTH-DAY, MARCH 25.

In the Senate, petitions for cheap ocean postage were presented, also several from New York in favor of strict adherence to Washington's doctrine of non-intervention. A bill was introduced granting more land to Mississippi and Louisiana for railroad purposes. A talk about the San Francisco Navy Yard occupied the latter part of the session.

The House spent the whole day upon the Deficiency Bill, but we find nothing said worth reporting.

SIXTH-DAY, MARCH 26.

The Senate spent the day in discussing the bill, which had passed the House, remitting the duty ($450) on some vestments sent as a present from Europe to the Carmelite Nunnery of Baltimore. The bill was lost by one majority. A Message was received from the President, stating that official papers had been mutilated or stolen from one of the Departments, and suggesting the enactment of a law making the offense penal. Adjourned till Second-day.

In the House, the Deficiency Bill was passed through all amendments in Committee of the Whole, and reported to the House. A spicy but good-natured pass-at-arms between Mr. Stanly of N. C., and Polk of Tenn., relieved the dullness of the day.

SABBATH-DAY, MARCH 27.

The Senate was not in Session.

The House had under consideration nothing but the Deficiency Bill, which was passed after considerable maneuvering. The bill appropriates upward of three millions of dollars. The following are the principal items: Dredging River at Philadelphia Navy Yard, $12,000; Dry Dock at at Brooklyn Navy Yard, 88,300; Quartermaster's Department, 775,000; Transportation of the army, 890,000; Purchase of horses, barracks, clothing, equipage and subsistence of five Companies of Texas mounted volunteers, 500,000; Adjourned.

European News.

The steamer Europa, with Liverpool dates to March 13, three days later, arrived at New York March 25th.

The English papers are full of the elections, which result generally in favor of the Government.

No decision has yet been come to respecting the disposal of the surplus funds arising from the receipts connected with the Great Exhibition. It appears, however, to be well understood, that the funds will be applied solely to purposes connected with the application of art to the manufactures of the country.

The Amazon Fund in England now amounts to above £11,000. It will be kept open for about another month, and it is most probable that it will ultimately reach £12,000. The final disposal of it will be made on the 10th inst., by the united committees of Southampton and London. About 150 persons have to be assisted or supported by it, among whom are 70 children and about 40 widows. About 30 of the children will be placed in orphan asylums.

In Ireland, the Riband Conspiracy, as it is called, is creating much uneasiness. In one district, it is said, the leading gentry are obliged, for the protection of their lives, not only to go out armed themselves, but to be accompanied by a strongly-armed force of constabulary. Travel in what direction you please along the roads in this district, at whatever hour, and you will be sure to meet these indications of a fearful struggle between civilization and savage barbarism.

M. Bocher, administrator of the property of the Orleans family, and MM. Malzy and Dubief, agents of the Distribution Letter Company of M. Bidault, have appealed against the judgement delivered on the 3d inst., by the Sixth Chamber of Correctional Police, condemning the first to 500f. fine, and the two others to 150f. each.

The Opinione of Turin announces that Marshal Marmont, Duke of Ragusa, died at Venice on the 2d inst., at 9½ o'clock in the morning. Thus, after an illness of six days, the last Marshal of Napoleon has expired in exile, at the age of 78. The capital feature in Marmont's biography is the separate capitulation by which he betrayed the Emperor at Fontainebleau, and according to which he uncovered his master by drawing off his corps d'armee to Verseilles, and leaving the road to Fontainebleau open to the allied armies concentrated at Paris.

The Mint of France has coined 2,000,000 five franc pieces bearing the effigy of the President of the Republic.

According to an Imperial ukase, the Jews of Russia are now to be classed in two categories, those who have a fixed residence and a trade, and those who have neither. The latter are to be employed in the public mines and fortresses. The classification is to be made in all the provinces where Jews are tolerated at one and the same time.

Tragedy in Virginia.

From the Fairmount Free Virginian of March 20.

A report was brought here on Thursday, by the mail carrier from Clarksburg, to the effect that a horrible and wholesale murder was committed in West Union, Doddridge County, on last Wednesday night. Six men and one woman are said to have been cruelly murdered. Money is supposed to have been the object, as $22,000 are said to have been taken by the perpetrators. It is thought that this crime and the escape of Owens from Clarksburg jail, were both effected by three men, strangers, who came to Clarksburg on the Sunday evening preceding, and who are now suspected to be accomplices of Jacques and his gang.

They are thought to have helped Owens out of jail by letting a rope down the chimney and drawing him up. He is known to have taken boat at Parkersburg, on the Ohio river, and it is feared he will escape. The other parties left Clarksburg on Wednesday, reaching West Union the same night. Stopping at the same house with a party of persons moving west, and either knowing or learning that the movers had money, the villains rose in the night and murderer every human being but themselves about the house, and escaped.

John Owens, who is here referred to, had been confined in the jail at Clarksburg, since November, on the charge of setting fire to the buildings burnt there at that time, and escaped on the night of Sunday, 14th inst., by crawling up the chimney.

Comparative Commerce of the Atlantic Cities.—Of the four principal ports, New York takes the lead, and her imports are considerably more than all the rest of the country. Next comes Boston, with about one fifth of the commerce of New York; then Philadelphia with considerabe less than one half, and Baltimore with about one fourth of that of Boston. New York imports about $150,000,000 of goods, Boston $30,000,000 to $35,000,000, Philadelphia $14,000,000, and Baltimore $8,000,000.

SUMMARY.

On the 12th inst., a short distance from Chicago, Ill., a hurricane swept over Duncklee's Grove, confining its ravages to a narrow track, which destroyed several houses and barns, trees, fences, &c., and killed several sheep. In Mr. Duncklee's house eighteen persons were assembled. It was a kind of family meeting—four of his married children with their families having arrived on a visit that day. Suddenly, and without premonition, the house was lifted several feet from its foundation, and was crushed in its fall. Mrs. Duncklee was instantly killed. A son-in-law had his foot broken and was seriously injured in his back. The remainder, as if by miracle, escaped with only slight contusions.

A Bahia paper of 10th of February, announces the defeat of Rosas, by the allied forces of Brazil and the revolted provinces of the confederation. The combat was bloody, resulting in a loss on both sides of 4,000 lives. Rosas and his daughter had taken refuge on board an English steamer. Probably the number of killed is much exaggerated, as usual in such cases, but of the main fact of the defeat of Rosas, there appears to be no room for doubt.

By the sudden breaking up of Grand River, on the 14th ult., great loss of property was sustained at the village of Paris, Canada West, by the flood. The river rose 15 feet above its usual level, submerging portions of the town, sweeping away bridges, (some of them 300 and 400 feet long,) lumber, sheep, &c., and doing much damage and mischief. No lives are known to have been lost, though there were several narrow escapes.

The Coronation of the Black Emperor of Hayti is to take place on the 11th of April, and not on the 18th of March, as before stated. The ceremony, which will be one of great pomp, will take place in Church. For the festivities which follow, an immense tent is to be erected on the Champ de Mars, back of the Palace. Twenty-five thousand troops, and all the dignitaries of the Island, are ordered to be present.

The Maine Law has passed the Minnesota Legislature, with a proviso for submitting it to a direct vote of the people. The vote throughout the Territory is to be taken on the first Monday in April, and if favorable the law goes into force the first of May.

In Northampton, Mass., recently, Mr. Justin E. Bragg, of that town, while out hunting, was resting over the muzzle of his gun, when his dog came up and put its paw upon the trigger, discharging the contents of the barrel into the unfortunate man, killing him instantly.

Reuben Edmondson, better known as "Jack Bowers," the most noted thief in the Mississippi Valley, died in St. Louis on the 6th ult. He was 63 years of age, and stated in a confession which he made just before his death, that he had been arrested 115 times, and incarcerated in various prisons 61 times.

On Friday night, March 19, the wife of a man named Bernhoeff was shot dead in her own house by an assassin, in Detroit, while her husband was absent, and a chest was robbed of $20. The husband on returning home found the house dark, and while groping about stumbled over his wife's dead body.

Two men were instantly killed, and three others fearfully injured, at Hell Gate, near New York, on the 26th ult. They were assisting Mons. Maillefort in his submarine operations at that place; and by some accident a canister of powder in one of the boats, instead of one at the bottom of the river, was touched off.

Two officers of the Suffolk Bank, Boston, undertook to run away last week, with funds of the bank in their hands. One of them was arrested on board the steamship Asia, just as she was starting from New York for Liverpool. The other, by concealing himself, managed to get off in the ship, carrying with him $10,000.

The Common Council of New York have withdrawn their advertising from the Tribune and Sun, to which papers they paid $1,000 each per year, and have given it to the Herald at $3,000, and two other papers at $2,000 each per year.

The whole number of criminal prosecutions in Massachusetts last year was 4,670. There were 1,208 convictions, 269 acquittals, 483 nol pros'd. In 615 cases no bill was found. The amount of costs in the above cases was $71,078,48.

Rev. A. J. Bingham writes to the Watchman of the Prairies, that, through the instrumentality of the labors of Rev. Jacob Knapp, ninety persons have been united to the Baptist church at Jacksonville, Ill. Mr. Knapp is at present laboring at Chicago.

A runaway slave in Florida was recently pursued by his owner, Col. Broward, and two of Col. B.'s slaves, and on being overtaken by one of the pursuing slaves, he turned and inflicted a fatal wound upon him. The runaway was subsequently shot by Col. Broward.

The managers of the Hospital have purchased the old Jail in Albany for $9,000, and will fit it up as a hospital. The old Green-st. Baptist Church, in the same city, has been sold for $6,000, for a theater.

The Odd-Fellows of Boston are to erect a splendid hall in that city within the ensuing year. It is to be of granite, four stories in hight, and will cost $80,000. This amount is to be divided in shares of $20 each.

DIED,

At his residence in Milton, Rock Co., Wis., June 23, 1851, Dea. Wm. P Stillman, aged 45 years. He had been an active and devoted member of the churches where he had resided. He embraced religion in early life, at Alfred, Allegany Co., N. Y., whence he removed to Genesee, where he was a member until he removed to Milton, and became a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church at that place, in the fellowship of which he continued until his death. He left a large family to mourn the loss of an affectionate father and companion.

At Milton, Rock Co., Wis., Sept. 23, 1851, Henry Goodrich, in the 20th year of his age. Bro. Goodrich was from Hancock, Berkshire Co., Mass. While at school there he became the subject of God's saving grace, and united with the First-day Baptist Church. Although his stay with that church was brief, yet his Christian conduct was such that he won the confidence and affection of the church. During the revival with us last winter, he embraced the Sabbath, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Milton. He was a man of deep piety and much prudence, and was universally respected as a citizen and a Christian. Although surrounded with every earthly blessing, he felt that his home was in heaven. He died as the good man dieth, and went where "the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest." V. H.

At Alfred Center, N. Y., March 18th, in the seventy-fourth year of her age, Thankful Rose, mother of David Rose, whose death was reported last week. Although the subject of this notice had never made a public profession of religion, yet she had for many years entertained a hope in the Saviour, which hope did not desert her in her last moments. N. V. H.

In Plainfied, Otsego Co., N. Y., March 19th, of inflammation of the lungs, at the termination of measles, Mrs. Sophia Mason, wife of Mr. Charles Mason, aged 52 years. Mrs. M. had been, for many years, a member of the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield. We trust she was fully prepared for her sudden and unlooked-for removal to the spirit world.

In Clarkville, Madison Co., N. Y., March 21st, of chronic pulmonary affection, Mrs. Martha Burdick, wife of Mr. Ethan Burdick, in the 82d year of her age. Sister B. became hopefully pious in yer youth; but she did not unite herself to the people of God until she was about 30 years of age, when she became a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Berlin, Rensselaer Co., N. Y., under the pastoral care of Eld. W. Satterlee. About the year 1812, she removed with her family to the town of Brookfield, Madison Co., where she united with the church now known as the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church of Brookfield, of which she remained a member until the close of life. Her faith in Christ was unwavering, her hope steadfast, and her love to her Redeemer, and attachment to his interest, constant to the end. She has gone, we trust, to receive her gracious reward of life eternal. W. B. M.

At New Market, N. J., March 20, Asa F. Randolph, after a protracted illness of nine years, which he bore with Christian resignation. He professed religion and united with the Church at New Market in 1837. When the Church at Plainfield was constituted, he was living in that place, and was one of its constituent members. Having established himself in New Market, he took a letter from the church at Plainfield, and united again with us, in February, 1852. He departed in peace to join the church triumphant. His character was unspotted; his life was one worthy of imitation; and his end was peace. W. B. G.

At the residence of her son, in Genesee, Allegany Co., N. Y., March 24, 1852, Lois Edwards, widow of Daniel Edwards, formerly of Charleston, R. I., in the 79th year of her age. Deceased was attacked with a paralysis of the nervous system, and collection of water on the brain, which terminated life after five days of severe sickness. She died as she had lived, in peace with all men, and we trust with God.

Miscellaneous.

Too Poor to Pay.

We were so poor when baby died,
And mother stitched his shroud,
The others in their hunger cried,
With sorrow wild and loud;
We were so poor we could not pay
The man to carry him away.

I see it still before my eyes:
It lies upon the bed,
And mother whispers through her sighs,
"The little boy is dead."
A little box of common pine
His coffin was—and may be mine!

They laid our little brother out,
And wrapped his form in white;
And, as they turned his head about,
We saw the solemn sight,
And wept as little children weep
And kissed the dead one in his sleep!

We looked our last upon his face,
And said our last "good bye,"
While mother laid him in the place
Where those are laid who die:
The sexton shoved the box away,
Because we were too poor to pay!

We were too poor to hire a hearse,
And couldn't get a pall,
And when we drove him to the grave,
A wagon held us all:
'Twas I who drove the horse, and I
Who told my mother not to cry.

We rode along the crowded town,
And felt so lone and drear,
And oft our tears came trickling down,
Because no friends were near.
The folks were strangers, selfish men,
Who hadn't lost a baby then.

We reached the grave, and laid him there,
With all the dead around;
There was no priest to say a prayer
And bless the holy ground;
So home we went with grief and pain;
But home was never home again!

And there he sleeps, without a stone
To mark the sacred spot,
But though to all the world unknown,
By us 'tis ne'er forgot;
We mean to raise a stone some day,
But now we are too poor to pay!

Cheap Ocean Postage.

This subject was recently brought before the Senate by Mr. Sumner, on whose motion a resolution was adopted instructing the Committee on the Post-Office to inquire whether something may not be done for the reduction of the present high rates. The brief remarks with which he submitted the resolution, present a condensed and powerful argument:—

"A letter can be sent three thousand miles in the United States for three cents; and the reasons for cheap postage on the land are equally applicable to the ocean.

"In point of fact, the conveyance of letters can be effected in sailing or steam packets at less cost than by railway.

"Besides, cheap ocean postage will tend to supersede the clandestine or illicit conveyance of letters, and to bring into the mails all mailable matter which, under the present system, is carried in the pockets of passengers, or in the bales and boxes of merchants.

"All new facilities for correspondence naturally give new expansion to human intercourse; and there is reason to believe that, through an increased number of letters, cheap ocean postage will be self-supporting.

"Cheap postal communication with foreign countries will be of incalculable importance to the commerce of the United States.

"By promoting the intercourse of families and friends, separated by the ocean, cheap postage will add to the sum of human happiness.

"The present high rates of Ocean postage, namely, 24 cents on half an ounce, 48 cents on an ounce, and 96 cents on a letter which weighs a faction more than an ounce, are a severe tax upon all, particularly upon the poor, amounting in many cases to a complete prohibition of foreign correspondence. This should not be so.

"It particularly becomes our country, by the removal of all unnecessary burdens upon foreign correspondence, to advance the comfort of European emigrants seeking a home among us, and to destroy, as far as practicable, every barrier to free intercourse between the Old World and the New.

"And, lastly, cheap Ocean postage will be a bond of peace among the nations of the earth, and will extend good will among men."

Flax and Flax-Cotton.

Gov. Farwell of Wisconsin has written a lucid and forcible letter to the State Agricultural Society, urging the propriety of a far more extensive cultivation of Flax in that State. Wheat has proved a very uncertain crop there, and some other staple must be extensively substituted. Gov. Farwell shows clearly that the climate and soil of Wisconsin are admirably adapted to the growth of Flax; that $25 per acre would not be a large average yield, while $40 per acre may be obtained; and that the importation and sale of 10,000 bushels of seed at a cost of $15,000 would secure a crop worth at least $250,000 for the present year, and not less than $2,000,000 next year.

Mr. John Galbraith, who has grown Flax in Waukesha County in each of the four last years, has had three good crops and one middling one. [During those four years, we believe, there have been two or three signal failures of the Wheat crop.] An efficient Breaking Machine is now in operation at Beloit, where Flax Straw is regularly purchased by the tun, rotted, dressed, and sent eastward to market. And, if the Governor's recommendation is seconded, there will soon be similar establishments in nearly every County, with Oil-Mills, where Seed may likewise be sold for cash.

—The Flax culture in this country will be considerably extended this season. Hon. Henry L. Ellsworth, formerly U. S. Commissioner of Patents, will sow 500 acres this season. As Seed will doubtless be dear for a year or so, it is computed that $30 per acre can be obtained from good land well cultivated in the Eastern States. The labor is hardly equal to that required to secure an average yield of Indian Corn. Twenty bushels of Seed have often been grown on an acre, and this alone will probably be worth $25; while the Straw will range from $5 to $10 per tun, as it shall be further from or nearer to breaking machinery. Twenty bushels of Seed and two tuns of Straw are considered a fair yield per acre in England.

Four companies are now engaged in the Manufacture of Linen Thread of this country—at Cohoes, N. Y.; at Willimantic, Conn.; at Lancaster, Mass.; and at Andover, Mass. The Cohoes Thread was never excelled in Great Britain nor anywhere else. (There are probably others; but these we know.) And a company has just been formed to manufacture Linen Fabrics at Fall River, Mass., with a capital of $500,000.

In England, the business goes on prosperously. One land-owner will sow 3,000 acres of Flax this year. Claussen's Flax-Cotton machinery is evidently gaining favor. His works at Stepney, near London, are a focus of public interest. There the cottonizing process (splitting the Flax fiber by saturating it first in a solution of soda and then in one of sulphuric acid) is completed in a few minutes, and at trifling cost. It has previously been steeped, however, in a cold solution of caustic soda, for some twenty-four hours.

In England, Flax Straw costs, as yet, some $15 to $20 per tun, delivered, while it may be profitably grown in this country for $3. [N. Y. Tribune.

Deepening Soils—Sub-Soil Plows and their Use.

When our Western farmers first settled upon their lands, and made their clearings, acre by acre, from year to year, and put in their wheat crop by simply dragging the top branches of a tree over the surface, there was little or no complaint made of wheat winter-killing by "frost heaving;" nor was there complaint of small return in product, if thought was given of how much of the land was occupied by stumps. Gradually, as the land became more cleared of stumps, the plow had been introduced, and under the erroneous impression that all the yellow soil was poisonous, the cultivator has, year after year, turned over the upper surface, (originally composed of all the elements necessary to the growth of plants,) and cropped it until it has become exhausted. At this point it became a question as to how an increased crop can be obtained from the land at the least expense, and without too great exhaustion of the soil. The utility of deep plowing is admitted, but any one knowing the composition of soils, together with the change wrought upon them by the action of air, would never think of running his plow so deep as to turn up, at first, four inches more of a soil than was ever before done. Deep and fertile soils are desirable, but a man who has a soil composed of clay mould four inches deep, resting upon a bed of yellow clay, as a subsoil, would be wild to take a common plow and turn it over eight inches deep for planting his corn. This depth of soil must be obtained gradually, year by year, inch by inch, as it is thrown up and exposed to the air and frost. Plants derive a portion of their support from grasses communicated to the soil from the atmosphere, and just so deep as the land is stirred, will the air penetrate.

A correspondent of the Ohio Cultivator, in advocating deep plowing, says, "There may be added to advantage, the sub-soil plow, to open the earth to an equal depth—to drain and mellow it, rendering it pervious to the roots of the plants, and subjecting it to the action of the atmosphere and rain. In this way not only is the supply of vegetable matter greatly increased, but oftentimes land made sterile by the presence of noxious oxides in the subsoil, is rendered productive by the free admission of oxygen, which acts as a corrective. Nor does it disprove these principles, that deep plowing of some lands may be followed by a diminished crop. This is frequently the case, in lands, which, from their peculiar character, or from long-continued superficial cultivation, have contracted a hard pan, impervious alike to water and air. In such cases, if sub-soiling were made to precede, for a year or more, deep plowing, the under soil would have imparted to it some degree of productiveness, when it might advantageously be brought to the surface.

The sub-soil plow does not bring the lower soil to the suface, as many suppose, but is designed to follow after the common plow, stirring the soil some six to ten inches deeper, in the same furrow. There are several patterns of plows, denominated sub-soil plows, but we confess, after examining them all, we prefer the one deemed a modification of the Scotch pattern. If the land is not too wet it loosens the whole width of the furrow, and by means of a narrow plate or mould-board, an underground drain is formed, that greatly facilitates the escape of surplus water, where the land has anything of rolling or descending character. Where the land is nearly level, the advantages derived from the use of a sub-soil plow are not as apparent as where the land has ready descent, unless is has been underdrained, a practice of which few appreciate the advantages until they have tried it. The English sub-soil plows, or all patterns of them which we have seen, do not lift the ground at all, but act only as would a knife if drawn along, cutting a slice, but not disturbing it from its bed in the least.

In the use of a sub-soil plow on clay ground, no man should attempt it without having both draft-rod and wheel attached, for without them he will find it difficult to guage the plow to the land so that his horses can work freely, and still more difficult to guage the depth. [Ohio Farmer.

Use of Cats' Whiskers.

Every one has observed the whiskers of a cat; but few, perhaps, dream that they serve any valuable end. The following passage will prove the contrary: Every one must have observed what are usually called the whiskers on a cat's upper lip. The use of these in a state of nature is very important. They are organs of touch. They are attached to a bed of close glands under the skin, and each of these long hairs is connected with the nerve of the lip. The slightest contact of these whiskers with any surrounding object is thus felt most distinctly by the animal, although the hairs of themselves are insensible. They stand out on each side of the lion, as well as in the common cat; so that, from point to point, they are equal to the width of the animal's body. If we imagine, therefore, a lion stealing through a covert of wood, in an imperfect light, we shall at once see the use of these long hairs. They indicate to him, through the nicest feeling, any obstacle which may present itself to the passage of his body; they prevent the rustle of boughs and leaves, which would give warning to his prey, if he were to attempt to pass through too close a bush; and thus, in conjunction with the soft cushions of his feet, and the fur upon which he treads, (the retractile claws never come in contact with the ground,) they enable him to move towards his victim, with a stillness even greater than that of the snake, who creeps along the grass, and is not perceived until he is coiled around his prey. A Voice of Warning.

I witnessed once a scene which comes appropriately in place here. During the commencement exercises of Emory College, upon one occasion, the Governor of the State of Georgia and his lady, with a goodly number of other friends, were staying with me. All were light-hearted, cheerful, and happy, when a female form, plainly but neatly attired, entered my gate and advanced to my door. I received her, and, upon her request to see the Governor, I conducted her to his room.

"Governor," said she, "I am the mother of the man who is to be executed, four days hence, at Columbus, for murder. Hearing of his sentence in Maryland, where I live, I hastened with all speed to Milledgeville, to beg of you a respite of his sentence till the meeting of the Legislature. There my money gave out; but not finding you there, I have followed you hither, having walked most of the way, (sixty-five miles,) to make the request. Governor, will you not suspend the sentence?"

"Madam," said the Governor, his eyes already filled with tears, for no Governor ever had a kinder heart, "if I were to grant the respite, you could not possibly reach him with it, in your enfeebled and exhausted situation, in time to save him."

"Yes, I will, Governor; give it to me, and I will have it in Columbus before the hour of execution arrives."

"Then you would have to travel night and day for four nights and three days and a half."

"Only give me the respite, and it shall reach him in time. I shall see him, any how, before he dies; but I have no time to lose."

"Madam," said the Governor, "I most deeply sympathize with you, and it pains me to tell you that I should violate my official duty to grant the respite. I have examined the case, and I cannot find a single mitigating circumstance in it, in your son's favor."

"Oh, Governor! my son is not a murderer at heart. His disposition is peaceable. He was not himself when he committed the deed. Oh, Governor! here on my knees, before you, I pray you have pity upon a poor, heart-broken, widowed mother!"

Our wives sobbed aloud, and the Governor and myself mingled our tears profusely over the bending suppliant. There was but one of the group that could speak, and that one bore the burden of us all, multiplied a thousandfold. The Governor raised her from her knees, and repeated, by a shake of the head, what he had already said.

And now went forth from that poor woman's heart—what shall I call it? A sigh? It was not that. A sob? It was not that. A groan? It was not that; but an indescribable out breathing of all that is eloquent in grief and melting in sorrow. Her accents had caught the ears of the group in the adjoining porch, and produced a death-like silence there; and my habitation, so lately the scene of mirth, was like the court of death.

At length she broke silence:—

"If there is no hope, I must hasten to my child before he dies."

She rose, and tremblingly advanced to the porch, followed by the sympathizing friend, but unyielding Chief Magistrate. She passed the crowd without seeming to notice them; and, as her foot fell upon the step that was to conduct her away from the habitation of hope, she cast back a melting look, and commenced her last appeal, with "Oh! Governor! for God's sake!"—when she sunk to the floor. At length, rising, as if moved by the thought that she was losing the time which alone would enable her to see her son alive, she retired.

The Governor disappeared with her; his carriage soon followed; and though no questions were asked on his return, I doubt not that he offered her the best solace he could, in her extremity, without a breach of duty.

Now I ask, what is all the good that ardent spirits have ever done, compared with the pangs which this poor widow has suffered? But hers was no uncommon case. Multiply her afflictions by ten thousand, and you will get the exponent of what one class, and that about the best of our race, have suffered from the use of inebriating drinks. Ah! God bless you, men, I fear we shall have a dread account to render at the court of Heaven, for our dealings with this class of the human family.

The Pimo and Maricopa Indians.

A member of the Mexican Boundary Commission furnishes the Providence Journal with some account of his adventures and experiences, from which we copy the following:—

The third day after leaving Tucson, we arrived at the Pimo villages, which we reached about 8 o'clock at night, and our camp was soon filled with Pimos and Maricopas. We remained four days among these interesting tribes. The villages are scattered for some 10 or 12 miles along a wide valley. Their houses are mostly circular, and are built of a frame work of poles, neatly covered with straw. They are 15 or 20 feet in diameter, and high enough within for a man to stand upright. The entrance is so low that it is necessary to crawl to enter, and this, the only opening, serves the treble purpose of door, chimney, and window. A small fire, built in the center, keeps the interior very hot as well as very smoky. Almost every house has a storehouse near it, which is frequently larger than the dwelling; this contains the supplies of corn, wheat, pumpkins, &c. The grain is stored in large jar-shaped baskets of straw, very neatly made, and holding 20 or 30 bushels. Though speaking distinct languages, the Pimos and Maricopas live together in harmony, and their dress and manners are almost identical. With the exception of such articles as they purchase from travelers, the dress of these people is a cotton blanket of their own manufacture. They raise an abundance of cotton, which they spin and weave into a coarse kind of blanket, which is very strong and durable. These people have very coarse, long hair, which usually comes low over the forehead, and behind is twisted into long strands, which are often tastefully looped up, and secured by means of a band woven of brilliant colored threads. A curious custom prevails among them of plastering up their hair with mud. This is worked into the hair, and fashioned into a sort of turban. When asked the object of this, they very frankly tell you that it was to kill the piojos. The hair is worn in this state until the mud dries, when it is washed out, and the hair comes out bright and glossy. The men generally have a blue line tattooed in the edge of the under eyelid, and extending back to the temples. The women have similar lines extending from each corner of the mouth to the chin. The most striking thing about these tribes is their industry in agricultural pursuits. They have immense fields under cultivation, which are irrigated by accquias, as neatly dug as any I have seen among the Mexicans. Their fields are fenced, and evidently cultivated with much care. It looked strange enough to see Indians, with painted faces, and decked out in red cloth and other finery, quietly ploughing and sowing. Their land seems to be well adapted to wheat and pumpkins; of the latter they had some of the largest specimens I have ever seen. Though apparently honest, these people are inveterate beggars, and in driving a bargain, they are quite sure to get the better. So many emigrants have passed through their village, who were glad to dispose of their effects at any price, that the Indians have learned to set an inordinate price upon their own goods, and to depreciate the value of those brought from abroad.

The Pimos and Maricopas have from time immemorial been at war with the Yumas, who live near the mouth of the river. One of the Yuma Chiefs, for some purpose, accompanied the Mexican Commission, and while they were encamped near these villages, the Maricopas entered the camp and killed the Yuma. A few days afterward, as we passed the lower village, we found the whole population dressed in their best finery and gaudily painted, dancing and singing around his head and hands. These Indians have very few fire-arms; they are expert with the bow, but their favorite weapon is the war-club.

Phillips's Account of Curran.

I caught the first glimpse of the little man through the vista of his garden. There he was,—on a third time afterward, I saw him in a dress which you would imagine he had borrowed from his tipstaff,—his hands on his sides; his under lip protruded; his face almost parallel with the horizon; and the important step and eternal attitude only varied by the pause during which his eye glanced from his guest to his watch, and from his watch reproachfully to his dining-room; it was an invariable peculiarity—one second after four o'clock, and he would not wait for the viceroy. The moment he perceived me, he took me by the hand, said he would not have any one introduce me; and with a manner I often thought was charmed, he at once banished every apprehension, and completely familiarized me at the priory. I had often seen Curran—often heard him—often read him; but no man ever knew anything about him who did not see him at his own table, with the few whom he selected. He was a little convivial deity; he soared in every region, and was at home in all; he touched everything, and seemed as if he had created it; he mastered the human heart with the same ease that he did his violin. You wept, and you laughed, and you wondered; and the wonderful creature, who made you do all at will, never let it appear that he was more than your equal, and was quite willing, if you chose, to become your auditor. It is said of Swift, that his rule was to allow a minute's pause after he had concluded, and then, if no person took up the conversation, to recommence himself. Curran had no conversational rule whatever; he spoke from impulse, and he had the art so to draw you into a participation, that, though you felt an inferiority, it was quite a contented one. Indeed, nothing could excel the urbanity of his demeanor. At the time I speak of, he was turned of sixty, yet he was as playful as a child. The extremes of youth and age were met in him; he had the experience of the one, and the simplicity of the other.

Communion Wine.

The Editor of The Maine Fountain, now speaking for Temperance through Connecticut, writes from Greenwich as follows:—

"At Stanwich I met with an article to which I wish to call the attention of churches in Maine. The question of using alcoholic wine at the communion has long excited the attention of some of the churches of our State, and since the passage of the law, which makes no provision for 'sacramental purposes,' some are anxious to know what they shall do for that ordinance. For several years past the Congregational Church in S. has used the pure juice of the grape—'the fruit of the vine,'—which they manufacture themselves, and preserve without fermentation. I have a bottle of the 'wine,' made by Mr. Close of Stanwich, and which is now eighteen months old, and perfectly sweet. I shall take it into Maine without any fear of a seizure, and shall exhibit it to some of our churches, having no doubt that they will prefer it to new rum and logwood. It is prepared by adding one pound of sugar to two pounds of the grape, and can be kept sweet for any length of time by bottling it up and keeping it in a cool place. There are men here who would gladly contract to supply the churches of Maine with this pure article, and I hope an arrangement may be made to that effect."

EXTRAORDINARY INCREASE.—Muller & Co. have been engaged in selling about a thousand building lots, situated between Fourth and Seventh Avenues, and Sixty-third and Seventy-third-sts., New York. The lots, comprising nearly fifteen blocks, presented a surface of a little more than 63 acres. Thirty years ago this land was purchased by the late James Amory for $4,000; now it sells for about Eight Hundred Thousand Dollars! Thus a lot which in 1822 cost $4 29, sells for $780; or an acre at $70 in 1822 brings $12,700 in 1852. These lots are in an unsettled portion of the Island, and but few of the streets are opened. A rise of six hundred per cent. per annum in thirty years, on so large a plot of ground, is probably without a parallel even in this go-ahead city. In this instance, the original investment had doubled itself every sixty days. [Tribune.

PRETTY GOOD FOR A BOY.—One day, says the paper at Grand Ligne, Canada, a Roman Catholic beggar came into a house where a boy, the son of one our colporteurs, happened to be. The beggar said he had just met with Protestants whom he had silenced in speaking of the pomps and ceremonies of his church, while theirs are as naked as anything can be. And he began to extol the richness, splendor, and magnificence of their houses of worship, adding that the Protestants had nothing to compare with it. Yes, replied the boy, looking sharply at him, you have splendid churches, but it is a great pity that there are so many beggars around them. The old fellow seized his hat and walked out.

Jacob Weaver, a Revolutionary soldier, recently died in Jefferson Co., aged 94.

A NOBLE ACT.—At a fire in New York, on the 17th ult., Mr. Joseph Mount, foreman of Hose Co. No. 14, distinguished himself in a manner deserving of the warmest approbation. Mr. M. was among the first at the fire, where he found that several persons were in the upper stories and in great peril. He rushed up the narrow stairs, which were already on fire, and found two women, three children, and two men crying for help. Mr. M. returned to the street, and, in default of the arrival of the ladder trucks, got a painter's ladder, which was some ten feet too short, put it on a barrel, and got up within reach of the window. At this time there was such a dense cloud of smoke rolling up under the ladder that suffocation seemed certain; but Mr. Mount quickly brought down one child, then another, and then one of the women, but the other woman was too heavy for him, and he was obliged to let her slide down the ladder. At this moment his strength gave way, and he and the woman both fainted and fell over the barrel upon the ground. All the women and children were saved without serious injury. Mr. Mount was taken home and placed under medical care. In the mean time the men got upon the roof, but one or both of them returned for the purpose of saving some $70 in money, and one lost his life, while the other was so badly burned as to be in much danger. N. Y. STATE LUNATIC ASYLUM.—A report has been recently presented to the Legislature, from which it appears that the number of patients in the State Lunatic Asylum, at Utica, at the commencement of the year 1851, was 429; 366 have been added to the number during the year, 112 discharged recovered—15 much improved—51 improved—134 unimproved, and 48 have died. Whole number remaining, 435. Whole number received into the Asylum up to the 1st of December, 1851, was 3,109; of whom 1,300 have been discharged recovered, 23 much improved, 511 improved, 472 unimproved, and 387 have died. The price for keeping persons in indigent circumstances has been fixed at $2 50, instead of $2 per week.

THE REMEDY.—"What," said a pompous West India planter, addressing himself to Wilberforce, "what, sir, is your remedy for slavery?" "Stop stealing," was the philanthropist's quick reply. The answer, now, here and to the same question, is all the one which needs to be made. Nobody in this land of abundance, should be forced to steal. When the reverend and witty Caleb Stetson, of Massachusetts, was told that slaveholders, because of their poverty, and of certain laws forbidding emancipation, without sending the slaves out of the State, could not emancipate their slaves, he exclaimed: "Let such slaveholders run away. Surely they can do that."

VARIETY.

Accustom a child, as soon as he can speak, to narrate his little experiences, his chapter of accidents, his griefs, his fears, his hopes; to communicate what he has noticed in the world without, and what he feels struggling in the world within. Anxious to have something to narrate, he will be induced to give attention to objects around him, and what is passing in the sphere of his instruction; and to observe and note events will become one of his first pleasures. This is the ground-work of a thoughtful character.

Roger Sherman was a representative in Congress from Connecticut; his business had been that of making shoes. John Randolph rose, and with his usual squeaking voice said, "I should like to know what the gentleman did with his leather apron before he set out for Washington." Mr. Sherman replied, imitating the same squeak—"I cut it up to make moccasins for the descendants of Pocahontas!"

Never talk of your parentage; for, if it is honorable, you virtually acknowledge your claims to rest on the merits of others; or, if it is mean, you wish to show that something good can come out of Nazareth; or, if it is neither, your conversation can be interesting only to yourself.

The city of London proper only covers an area of six hundred and forty acres, or one square mile. The property on this space is worth five hundred millions of dollars, which is about the assessed value of the real estate of Pennsylvania.

Never hesitate to engage in a noble enterprise for fear you have no power to render it important aid. There is no position so humble where a man may not be a benefactor in the cause of truth.

Take away the feeling that each man must depend upon himself, and he relaxes his diligence. Every man comes into the world to do something.

On the morning of Feb 6th, the steam saw-mill owned by Wm. D. Burdick, of Hornellsville, N. Y., was destroyed by fire. No insurance.

Seventy feet of the dam of the Genesee Canal, at West Morris, has been carried away. It will take several months to repair the damage.

The ship Russell Glover, of New York, bound for New Orleans, went ashore off Nun Jack, in the Bay of Abaco, on the 21st ult., and with the cargo is a total loss.

The Charter incorporating the Company for the projected Exhibition of the Industry of All Nations has passed both branches of the New York Legislature by large majorities.

A new railroad from Hornellsville to the State line at Ripley is projected, which it is said will save about twenty-five miles of distance.

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June of each year.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress
Rev. J. W. MORTON, } Assistants.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, }

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—
The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term, and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term, Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00

THE PURITAN PILGRIMS.

Nations have arisen, acted their part in the world's many-scened drama, and then disappeared. As sinks the bark on the ocean amid contending elements, so have sunk most of the ancient nations. Some have shot like meteors athwart the vast vault of time—a few leaving a brilliant and enduring train of glory behind, but most disappearing with an evanescent gleam, and leaving a gloom the more cheerless and dismal from the contrast.

In their places other nations have arisen. Among these, there is one whose stars shine with peculiar effulgence. Its origin is unique, not being traced to uncertain dates or ambiguous myths and fables. It has not sprung from a savage state by the slow process of civilization—from the old and dilapidated systems of the dark ages, or the seethings of revolutions; but some of the purest, the most perfect embodiments of liberty, knowledge, and religion, of the Old World, were the Heaven-ordained founders of the American Republic.

The struggling light of the sun of political and religious liberty, gleamed but faintly through the clouds of oppression that hung over the old world. Many a true heart among Albion's sons, yielding implicit obedience to the higher law of conscience, enlightened by the truths of religion, watched with anxious eye the scorn, the faggot and flame, depicted in the shade and gloom that hung over their homes. As the shades of oppression gathered around, they turned to the Sun of Freedom, as turns the Moslem in his devotions to the king of day. Repressing the impulses of hearts warm with love for their fatherland—its glens and heaths—its moss-covered cottages, classic halls, and church spires, beneath which their accustomed devotions rose, while around clustered the graves of their sires—they became willing pilgrims to some more favored land. But they mistook the rays of freedom, reflected by the waters encircling their sea-girt homes, as emanating from Holland, and thither they directed their course. Holland, though offering many privileges to the oppressed, was not the country for a people whose destiny it was to be the founders of a nation. There was another land—a sylvan land—where there was plenty of room for their powers to expand unrestrained—free alike from the allurements and the oppressions of the old world.

Seeking such a land, and such a destiny, they took their departure from their homes—from the civilized world, rendered dear to them by many and varied privileges and associations, but where true religion walked in sackcloth and sandals, while the false held the sceptre. The sere leaf, the fitful winds, the brazen skies of autumnal months, omens of approaching winter, calculated to check the ardor of voyagers, did not abate the zeal of spirits nerved up to a great and holy duty. They directed their course towards America. As they sped their way across the ocean, their tearful, uplifted eyes, their solemn, devout appearance, as winds and storms played around, or tossed their bark upon the surging billows, declared that they trusted in the Ruler of storms, and that their purpose was a holy one—that they came as "Heaven's soldiers," to unfurl the banner of more equal rights, and a purer religion, than the world then enjoyed. They did not trust in vain; for Providence was pilot, and they landed safely on Plymouth Rock. They found themselves on a rocky coast—an unexplored wilderness country before them—a vast and dangerous ocean behind them, from whose perils they had just escaped—and in an inhospitable clime, with the rigors of its winter just closing around them.

Though all nature thus presented a sombre and cheerless aspect, seeming to give them a cold and forbidding welcome, yet they greeted America with devout gratitude, and pressed her soil with a firm step, determined to plant the tree of liberty, and bequeath it unmarred to their posterity. They watered this tree with their tears, and nourished it with their blood. Thus watered, thus nourished, its growth was rapid. Its branches spread far and wide, affording shade and protection to rising generations, while from it nations pluck perennial fruit. As the Puritan Fathers fell, one by one, they fell like gems dropt from eternity into the sea of time, starting encircling, expanding waves, the impress of which the remotest shores of time will gladly receive.

From such an origin there has sprung into existence a nation, youthful, energetic, gigantic in power and dimensions, and exalted in rank and influence. Occupying such a position, the eyes of all nations are fixed upon them with an interest akin to that felt by the helpless nations of the North, as they behold the first returning rays of the sun after their long and cheerless night. As they, with delight, bid adieu to whole constellations of inferior orbs, and to the flashing, inconstant light of the Aurora Borealis, for the sun's steady and vivifying light, so nations, now struggling amid darkness and oppression, turn to this nation as a steady, serene, and never-failing light, warming and cheering their desponding hearts. The elective sparks of liberty evoked by the Pilgrim Fathers, have rushed down the chain of time, enkindling in many nations the hitherto latent fires of freedom.

As the moral and political energy, excellence, and influence of our republican institutions are but the legitimate fruits of the principles and labors of the Puritan Pilgrims, this nation, but more especially the descendants of the Puritans, have important responsibilities resting upon them, in view of the trust bequeathed to them. They are emphatically called upon to be the conservators and promulgators of those principles. A voice ascends from the lowly graves of their fathers, imploring them as their sons to protect the institutions for the founding of which they left their fatherland, for which they prayed, labored, and suffered. The blood of liberty's martyrs cries to them from many a battle-field, beseeching them not to prove recreant to the cause for which they fought, bled, and died. A prayer comes to them from the South, imploring them, by the horrors of the slave-ship—by the groans of man extorted by his brother man—by the sighs of immortal minds for the bread of life denied him by kindred spirits—to speak in behalf of Afric's sons—to make America what it professes to be—a land of liberty. The hardy pioneer, on the borders of civilization, looks, in his daily toils, to the descendants of those who, like himself, forsook their native land, and became pioneers in a western world. He asks them to throw around him the ægis of liberty—to send to him the light of knowledge, the bread of life. Maternal affection asks for assistance in polishing the immortal minds committed to her care. The tocsin of freedom, which the Puritan Pilgrims commenced sounding in the ears of the oppressed millions of Europe, is arousing them from their long and troubled slumbers during the night of despotism. They are now calling for assistance in advancing those prinples which we have been so long and earnestly proclaiming to the world.

Those in whose hearts beats Puritan blood or Puritan principles, are called upon by the past, present, and future—by all of the poor and oppressed—by all those struggling after light and liberty—to lend a helping hand in delivering this world from error, sin, and oppression—in scattering the fog and mist hanging over the minds of men—in raising bleeding virtue from the dust, and enthroning her in the hearts of men—in agitating the mighty ocean of mind, which, by its convulsions, may be purified from the dark streams of vice that have so long flown into it. They are to live and act with high resolves, and for noble purposes, regardless of opposition or discouraging prospects, ever resting in the full assurance that > "Truth, crushed to earth, shall rise again:

> The eternal years of God are hers;
> But error, wounded, writhes in pain,
> And dies among his worshipers."

PUGET SOUND—OREGON.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

I wish to call the attention of those who are about to start for Oregon, to the claims that the country about Puget Sound has to their consideration. A full report of that region may be found in the "U. S. Exploring Expedition," by Capt. Wilkes; and for the benefit of those who have not access to that work, I will give a few extracts. It is well known, that the possession of this country was the chief question in dispute between the United States and Great Britain in determining the Oregon Boundary. The Hudson's Bay Company had an agricultural establishment at the Southern extremity of the Sound, which also furnished all the produce for the supply of the Company's stations on the Pacific coast, and 15,000 bushels of wheat annually, besides butter and cheese, to the Russian settlements. Those who have access to Col. Fremont's map of Oregon and California, will get a good general view of these waters. Their extent north and south is about 150 miles; and from the great number of arms and ramifications, forming bays, canals, &c., the extent of coast is very great, and furnishes many good sites for towns. There is every variety of soil, and the scenery is represented as being remarkably picturesque. Wilkes says:

"Nothing can exceed the beauty of these waters, and their safety. Not a shoal exists within the Straits of Juan de Fuca, Admiralty Inlet, Puget's Sound, or Hood's Canal, that can in any way interrupt their navigation by a seventy-four-gun ship. I venture nothing in saying, there is no country in the world that possesses waters equal to these." "The shores of all these inlets and bays are remarkably bold, so much so that in many places a ship's sides would strike the shore before the keel would touch the ground." "They abound with the finest fish in great abundance, and immense quantities of shell fish, including the common clam, black muscle, oysters," &c.

"The best land occurs where the prairies are intersected or broken by belts of woods, that have a dense undergrowth of hazel, dogwood, and cherry. Some of the prairies have a thin soil, though exceeding beautiful in appearance. The distance from Puget Sound to the Columbia River is about 150 miles. The first two days journey is over a continuous plain, with trees scattered through it like a park. The second day's journey, it is stated, the park scenery increased in beauty, and it was almost impossible to realize that we were in a savage and wild country, and that nature, not art, had perfected the landscape. Beautiful lakes, with green-sward growing to the water's edge, with deer feeding fearlessly on the margin, and every tint of flower, many of which were not new to our gardens at home, strewn in profusion around. We could hardly, in galloping along, but expect to see some beautiful mansion as a fit accompaniment to such scenery."

Passing the dividing ridge which separates the waters of Puget Sound from those of the Columbia River, he entered the valley of the Cowlitz.

"Our route lay through alternate woods and prairies, the former composed of large pines and cedars. Several considerable streams of water were passed, whose banks were not so high as those before met with, the latter covered with strawberries so tempting as to induce us to dismount and feast upon them."

On the Cowlitz, about sixty miles distant from Puget Sound, was an old Catholic mission.

"The grounds at the farm were covered with a luxuriant crop of wheat. At the further end of the prairie was to be seen a settlement, with its orchards, &c. The degree of progress resembled that of a settlement of several years standing in our Western States, with the exception, however, of the remains of the conquered forest; for here the ground is ready for the plow, and nature seems as it were to invite the husbandman to his labors. Around the superintendent's house is a kitchen garden, in which all the usual horticultural plants of the United States were growing luxuriantly. The climate is thought to be particularly well adapted to them."

"The soil along this river appears to be of a good quality, a clayey loam, with vegetable mould over trap rock and sand stone."

"On this river it was reported that coal of a good quality existed, but I examined all the places that indicated it, and only found lignite."

[Coal is now known to abound there in large quantities.]

"The route by the way of the Cowlitz will in all probability be that which will hereafter be pursued to the northern waters and sounds."

"The settlers on the Cowlitz prefer it to the Willamette, although the land here is not so good as in the valley of the latter; but they say that many vegetables succeed here that will not grow on the Willamette."

Such was the country eleven years since, when but two settlements had been attempted. Towns have now sprung up where the Indian then baked his quahaugs, and we have from time to time the hasty and laconic epistles from the settlers who are taking up those choice prairies by the shore of those inland seas, which, by their very brevity, indicate their perfect contentment.

An extract from a late Oregon paper, states that considerable attention appears to be drawn towards the Puget Sound country at this time. Several parties have returned from a tour of examination, and report very favorably of that portion of the Territory. Several business men will soon leave with their families to take up their permanent residence at Olympia. It is said that the best of claims can be secured in that region for a large population.

Several weeks since, I addressed a letter of inquiry to the collector at the port of Olympia, through a mutual friend, and when answer is returned, I will make its purport known.

That the waters of which I have been speaking will in a few years be a great resort for commerce, is saying but little. The difficulty and danger of entering the mouth of the Columbia during a great part of the year, and the probability of a rail-road from Puget Sound to the Columbia, are considerations not to be overlooked. There is another point of view of no small importance. It is well known, that the North Pacific affords the best whaling ground now resorted to, and vessels are now sent out from San Francisco, and for the want of a better place, they are sent to the Sandwich Islands to fit out. I have no doubt that in a few years the whale fishery will be carried on chiefly from this place, and the oil sent home in the ships that now return from that coast empty. The anxiety on the part of most of the emigrants heretofore to get gold, has caused this place to be neglected, but those who are seeking for pleasant homes are now turning their steps thither.

Those who go out this season overland will probably reach their destination sooner than those who will go from here in the fall. Upon them will devolve the responsibility of selecting a site for a settlement; and, in the words of a correspondent, we hope that "those who manage the matter may be men of wisdom and experience, and who will also have the glory of God, and the good of the cause of truth, and the good of their brethren, in view."

I am making arrangements to have a vessel leave here on the 1st of October. The size of the vessel will depend upon the number who offer themselves, and as much will depend upon this to determine the cost of passage, I cannot state further at present.

The movement meets with great favor among all, as far as I have heard. I cannot forbear quoting from a letter I have received since I began writing this article, from a friend in Illinois:—

"Our little denomination, which has withstood the tide of popular prejudice for so many years, I have sometimes almost feared would become extinct, through the many temptations which daily surround the most of us, especially our young men; and even to those of riper years, the temptations to which they are exposed often prove too strong for them. Some of us, living here in the West, have frequently talked of a similar movement, but we had no Moses; yet many of us have anxiously hoped that some one might soon undertake the important work. I can bid you God speed from an honest heart. * * * I do not know what sacrifice, that is within my power to make, would be too great for me, if a movement was made that would promise success. We are now in the finest farming country I ever saw, but in numbers we are weak, and the price of land around us is high; consequently our people must remain few and feeble. I have no doubt of fifty families being ready to start in the fall."

My correspondent also expresses his preference for the Puget Sound country, and sends me a couple of letters from a recent immigrant to that country, who, after traveling over the settled parts of Oregon, finally located at Puget Sound, and thus discourses to his friends in Illinois:—

NEW YORK, Oregon Ter.,
November 28, 1851.

DEAR BROTHER,—Since I wrote to you at Portland, I have moved about 150 miles to a new town called New York, situated on Puget's Sound. We came here on water, which afforded us the pleasure of a short voyage on the Pacific. * * * *

I have not had an opportunity for examining the country, but I am satisfied that it is the place for me. The health cannot be doubted, the navigation cannot be excelled in the world, in all other important respects it is not inferior to other parts of Oregon. My reasons for leaving the Willamette Valley were the difficulty of getting good claims (which is not the case here) and the navigation of the Willamette being rather difficult at Portland. If you come next season, it is my opinion that you had better come here. * * *

We are now in latitude, about 70° 30' and have had only two frosts that are worthy of notice, and they would not be called hard.

JERUSALEM—JEWS OF PALESTINE.

From the "Narrative of a Mission of Inquiry to the Jews from the Church of Scotland in 1839." [Continued.

In the cool of the evening, we enjoyed our first walk about Jerusalem, Mrs. Nicolayson accompanying us upon her donkey. Passing by the Armenian Convent, which appeared to be the largest and most substantial in the city, surrounded with a pleasant garden, we went out at the Zion Gate, the only gate now open on the southern wall of the town, and came out upon the open summit of Mount Zion, for one-half of that hill is now outside of the walls. A gloomy, ill-shaped building near the gate is an Armenian convent, enclosing what is called by the monks the House of Caiaphas; and nearer the southern brow is a small mosque covering the tomb of David. The minarets of this mosque, and of that on the Mount of Olives, were both destroyed by an earthquake a few years ago. There is a prevailing and much credited tradition, that within that building is the very tomb of which Peter said in his sermon, "His sepulchre is with us unto this day."

These are the only prominent buildings upon the unwalled part of Zion. Leaving them on the left, we wandered among the flat tomb stones of the Greeks and Latins. The graves of some of the American missionaries were pointed out to us, and also a small spot of ground which they have purchased and enclosed as a burying-place, though we were told that they were still uncertain whether they would be permitted to bury in it, as the Moslems had found out that the shadow of David's mosque fell upon it at certain hours of the day.

Zion is truly desolate. The only fortified building upon it is the Castle of David, erected on the side of the tower of Hippicus, within the walls, and close by the Jaffa Gate. This alone of all the bulwarks of former days still remains, so that when we obeyed the command, "Walk about Zion, and go round about her, tell the towers thereof," we saw in the very absence of all her towers and fortresses the force of the words, "They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth for ever." Full trust in the Lord Our Righteousness, apart from all human helps and additions, establishes the soul firm as the hill of Zion, firmer far than all its bulwarks and palaces, which are now swept away as if they had never been.

Approaching nearer to the brow of the hill, we found ourselves in the midst of a large field of barley. The crop was very thin, and the stalks very small, but no sight could be more interesting to us. We plucked some of the ears to carry home with us, as proofs addressed to the eye that God had fulfilled his true and faithful word, "Therefore shall Zion for your sake be ploughed as a field." The palaces, the towers, the whole mass of warlike defenses, have given way before the word of the Lord, and a crop of barley waves to the passing breeze instead of the banner of war. On the steep sides of the hill, we afterwards found flourishing cauliflowers arranged in furrows, which had evidently been made by the plough; so that this important prophecy, twice recorded, is most fully accomplished.

From the southern verge of Zion, we looked down into the valley of Hinnom, still called Wady Jehennam, which lies nearly due east and west. It appeared very deep, the opposite side rocky and precipitous, and the bosom of it filled with shady olive-trees. Here Manasseh caused his children to pass through the fire to Moloch; and here Jeremiah uttered that dreadful prophecy, "This place shall no more be called Tophet, nor the valley of the son of Hinnom, but the valley of Slaughter." From the awful wickedness committed in this valley, perhaps as much as from the satanic fires kindled in it, the name came to signify the place of eternal sin and woe. To us it appeared a pleasant shady valley, but in other days, when the precipitous sides were planted with thick trees, it may have been gloomy enough. Instead of descending into it, we turned and went down the steep western side of Zion into the valley of Gihon, which lies nearly north and south on the west side of Jerusalem, to examine the upper and lower Pools of Gihon. We came first to the lower pool, and, standing on the edge, were surprised at the vast size of the basin, which is by far the largest reservoir of the Holy City, though it is much dilapidated and perfectly dry. It is formed in a very simple manner, by throwing a massy wall across the lower end of the valley. This wall answers also the purpose of a bridge, which is crossed in going to Bethlehem. There is a neat fountain at the middle of it, to refresh the traveler, with an Arabic inscription; but we found no water in it. The stones of this wall are closely cemented, and the work is evidently ancient. There are also the remains of a wall at the upper end, and on both sides. The bottom of the pool is merely the natural bed of the valley, and is bare and rocky. On one of the ledges of the rock beneath us, sat two men beating out corn with a staff; which is used instead of our flail, and is referred to by Isaiah, "The fitches are beaten out with a staff, and the cummin with a rod."

We proceeded up the valley as far as under the Jaffa Gate, and then to the north-west, till we came upon the conduit or rude aqueduct of the upper pool, out of which a flock were satisfying their thirst, and shortly after to the upper pool of Gihon itself. The walls of this pool are in a much more perfect condition than those of the lower pool, the strong walls being unbroken, the cement still remaining, and the steps into it from the corners nearly entire. It was about half full of pure water. We spent some time here, and plucked leaves from a large Botin or Terebinth tree, which grows close by. It was here that Solomon was anointed king; and these valleys were once made to resound with the cry, God save King Solomon. This is the spot also where the prophet Isaiah stood with his son Shear-jashub, the type of returning Israel. "Go forth now to meet Ahaz, thou and Shear-jashub thy son, at the end of the conduit of the upper pool, in the highway of the fuller's field." The conduit here spoken of is no doubt the same as that mentioned above, which now conducts the water from the pool into the city; and we were told that it carries the water into Hezekiah's pool, a large tank upon Mount Acra, at the back of the consul's house, which we afterwards saw. "The end of the conduit" must be the place where it first appears above ground, so that the highway to the fuller's field probably passed that spot. Beside the same pool where Solomon had been anointed king, did the venerable Prophet stand and tell Israel of their coming King and Saviour, "Behold, a virgin shall conceive and bare a son, and shall call his name Immanuel."

It is interesting also to remark, that it was here Rabshakeh, the Assyrian captain, stood at the head of a great army, and reproached the living God. And it was from this point that he cried in the Jews language to the men that sat upon the wall, a fact which goes to prove, that the wall of Jerusalem must have extended much farther to the north-west than it does at present.

Around the pool is a burying-place for the Mahometan dead; where tombs were lying broken and scattered about in a most desolate manner. From the rising ground near, we got a view of the plain or valley of Rephaim, lying south-west of the city, and which is still so fertile, that we were assured it is capable of yielding three crops in the year. To this fertility the prophet Isaiah refers. He says, "The glory of Jacob shall be made thin," and shall be no more like the rich waving field of Rephaim, but only like its gleanings; "it shall be as he that gathereth ears in the valley of Rephaim."

In this plain, too, David twice defeated the Philistines, who had penetrated as near as this to the royal city; and somewhere not far off was Baal-perazim, where the heat of the conflict was greatest,—the type of a yet more terrible conflict in the latter days, when "the Lord shall rise up as in Mount Parazim."

By the help of Mr. Nicolayson, we now attempted to trace the probable extent of ancient Jerusalem upon the north. There is room for a great city on the elevated ground to the north of the present wall, and there can be little doubt that the Bezetha of Josephus, which Agrippa enclosed with a third wall of great strength, occupied a vast range of that district. It now consists of cultivated fields and olive plantations; but remains of ruins are visible in many parts of it. When the wall of the city was thus stretched out to the north, and included the whole of Mount Zion on the south, it is not very difficult to understand how Jerusalem could contain the millions who are said to have been sometimes gathered into it. In the distant north we could see the hill Scopus which encloses Jerusalem on the north, where Titus first encamped when he came to besiege Jerusalem, "from whence the city began already to be seen, and a splendid view was obtained of the great temple." We returned by the Cave of Jeremiah, a grotto cut in the rock almost due north of the Damascus Gate, lying in the road from Anathoth, his native village, and where tradition says he wrote the Book of Lamentations. We reached our dwelling a little before the city gates were closed for the night.

TESTIMONY OF A MISSIONARY.—At a public meeting, the Rev. W. Hands, a missionary in the East Indies, observed that he owed every thing to Sunday-schools; for it was there that the heavenly spark had first caught his soul; it was there that he had first lifted up his voice for the purpose of imparting Christian instruction to others. If it had not been for that opportunity, he should probably never have offered himself to the Missionary Society. Therefore, again he said, that he had every reason to bless God that he had begun by being a Sunday-school teacher, especially as he believed that it was principally through the labors of Sunday schools, that the Gospel of the Redeemer was extended throughout the world.

THE POOR MAN'S BOOK.

BY GEO. W. BUNGAY.

The winds have blown the smoke away—
Cold is the forge, and hushed the mill;
The "toil-worn cotter" rests to-day—
Traffic is mute and labor still.

The unharnessed horse feeds on the green,
The laboring ox rests in the shade;
A holy calm pervades the scene,
And beauty smiles from hill and glade.

The modest flowers that light the clod,
Like drops of sunshine from the sky,
Bow their sweet heads and worship God,
And send their fragrant praise on high.

Beneath his fig-tree and his vine,
Beside the lowly cottage door,
The poor man reads the precious line
Of promise to the humble poor.

The Bible is the poor man's law,
A blessed boon to mortals given;
A ladder such as Jacob saw,
With angels coming down from heaven.

FREEDOM OF EDITORS.

We hear a great deal said in these days about the freedom of the press, by persons who seem to be ignorant of the very meaning of the term. Freedom of the press is supposed by many to be the liberty of everybody to print whatever sense or nonsense he sees fit to write, at the expense of the money and reputation of newspaper publishers. While we go for freedom of the press, we also go for freedom of editors. A pastor, who is set as a teacher of a church, has the liberty, within reasonable limits, of controlling the use of his pulpit. He may prevent its being made the means of disseminating heresy, or schism, or folly. In this he is upheld, and no one deems him a tyrant or a usurper. Not so, however, with a newspaper proprietor. Unlike the preacher, the columns of the paper are his own; to their use he has a moral and legal right, and whoever wishes him to admit to them irrelevant or unsuitable matter, attempts to diminish the value of his property, and, what is more, the editor's reputation for judgment and good sense.

One man has written a poem in which bad spelling, bad rhythm, bad sense, and bad syntax contend together for the mastery; whose author would seem like a > ——"crusader sent

> From some outlandish clime,
> To pluck the eyes of sentiment,
> And dock the tail of rhyme;
> To crack the voice of melody,
> And break the legs of time."

The poem is rejected, and the editor, except in the case of some persons of rare good-nature, has made an enemy for life. Some minister has been guilty of wrong-doing, and the fact is sent to the paper as a warning. Its publication is demanded, although it may subject all concerned in the printing and publishing to a harassing suit for libel. One person wishes more independence on the part of the editor; he ought to call things by their right names, and not be influenced by public opinion. Another thinks that an editor ought not to have any opinions whatever; that his only business is to correct the spelling and grammar of the communications sent, publishing all sorts of articles, on all sorts of subjects, from all sorts of people, without a word of comment, giving the privilege to everybody else to express their opinions, while he who is held by the public responsible for the character of his paper must rigidly abstain from the exercise of the same privilege. The editor is favored with advice, perhaps several times in the same day, of a diametrically opposite purport, and is each time told that his patronage from the community depends upon following each course marked out, though precisely contradictory. Now, to a sensible editor, such advice is valuable, and should never be despised or undervalued. He should lay up such hints as guides in the formation of his opinions, and as tests of the state and tendencies of the public mind. But it is obviously impossible for him to follow all the mutually destructive courses marked out for his guidance. He must lay aside the hope of satisfying all his patrons, and his only course is to seek aid from on high to form correct opinions for himself, and to follow them with conscientious steadiness and zeal.

An editor is responsible for what he says himself, and for what he admits to his columns, just as a pastor of a flock is responsible for his own sentiments, and for the sentiments of those whom he invites into his pulpit. To have the control over his own columns is his right, which no man may take from him. This right is connected with his responsibility, otherwise it could not exist. To accuse an editor of restricting the freedom of the press when he exercises his own undoubted rights, is simply ridiculous. The freedom of the press is the liberty of every man to publish a newspaper who wishes to, and to discuss in it any subject whatever. The freedom of every one to use the columns of another man's newspaper would be the liberty for him to put his hand into the publisher's pocket, and take out just as much money as he might wish to, and the additional freedom to scatter broadcast every sort of error and delusion.

It is an editor's duty to control his own columns, as in the fear of God he believes to be most conducive to the good of the world. If his subscribers, or any portion of them, become dissatisfied with his action, they have the undoubted right to withdraw their subscriptions. Having done so, they have no further claims upon the sinning editor, so long as he keeps within the limits prescribed by the law.

FEELING FOR THE PILLARS.—When Luther was a Coburg, he wrote to a friend, "I was lately looking out of my window at night, and I saw the stars in the heavens, and God's great, beautiful arch over my head, but I could not see any pillars on which the great builder had fixed his arch; and yet the heavens fell not, and the great arch stood firmly. There are some who are always feeling for the pillars, and longing to touch them, they stand trembling and fearing lest the heavens should fall. If they could only grasp the pillars, then the heavens would stand fast. Thus Luther illustrated the faith of his own soul, and wished to inspire others with the same strong confidence.

THE EDUCATION OF GOD'S PEOPLE.

God designs by his grace to give his people an education. The standard, in view of which their education is to be conducted, is his Law. When they are perfectly conformed to this standard, their education will have been completed. In just so far as they lack this conformity, their education is incomplete.

The great commandment of the law being that which requires supreme love to God, they are supposed to be conformed to it who uniformly prefer God's glory to their own comfort. Jesus Christ, who could, under all circumstances of trial, say, 'Not my will but thine be done,' was an example of the most perfect conformity to the divine law. Of course, they are well educated who are like Jesus Christ.

In carrying forward the education of his people, frequent seasons of examination are appointed, that it may be determined what progress they have made. As the scholars in an institution of learning have their examination days, so do God's people. Times of affliction are these seasons of examination.

In submitting to be taught by God, one says, "I will let no earthly object draw away my affections, but my whole heart shall be given to thee, O God." God takes him under his instruction. After a time, He says, in his providence, 'Let me see what progress you have made. You have a little child whom you fondly love; one that is entwined in your heart's affections, and whose every motion you look upon with fond delight. Let me have that child; I have need of him in heaven.' But the parent, perhaps, very soon shows, that his tutorge in the school of divine grace has, thus far, been to but little purpose. He murmurs at the loss; he frets; he refuses to be comforted. It is very apparent, that instead of loving God with all his heart, according to the requirement of the law, he loved that child whom he has lost a little better. He cannot feel that God has done perfectly right in taking it away. He cannot say, as Job did, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." True, he does not dare to say, in so many words, that God has done wrong; yet he does not acquiesce in his heart. Thus he passes his examination with but little credit to himself.

After a time, he is subjected to another examination. For it must be determined whether his longer continuance in the school of divine grace is attended with any progress. Something must be done to prove whether the great principle of the law, which requires supreme love to the Creator, has become any more deeply implanted in his heart. He has other children, but they are not so much the idols of his heart as the one that he lost was, and Infinite Wisdom judges it best to try him on another point. He has for some time devoted his attention to the accumulation of wealth. In business he has been greatly prospered, and the great danger is, that he will feel his soul to be satisfied with the comforts which wealth procures. It is an important question, whether, if God shall judge it best, he can heartily acquiesce in such a dispensation as will strip him of all his riches, and make him a poor man. If he can, and will say under it, "Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither—the Lord do as seemeth him good," it will prove that graco has exercised its influence upon him to some purpose, and that his spiritual education is going forward. The examination day comes. Does it appear that he has made any progress? Does it appear that the law is indeed written on his heart? Or does he, in his dissatisfaction with the providence, say, 'Ye have taken away my gods, and what have I more?'

But other seasons of examination are coming. They occur, at repeated intervals, throughout one's life. The design of them all, however, is to show what progress the Christian has made towards conformity to that law which requires him to prefer God's glory to every thing else. To this law he must be conformed, otherwise heaven is no place for him. This is the great constitutional principle, upon which the moral government of God is founded. Obedience to specific statutes is necessary, as evincing the conformity of the heart to this great fundamental principle. Whether the principle is truly wrought into the heart, can be determined only by submitting to trial. "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation."

How complete was Job's spiritual education! His children were all taken from him at once. His property was swept away by a single blast. Reduced to poverty and written childless in one moment! Yet "in all this he sinned not, nor attributed folly to God." His body was, withal, smitten with loathsome disease. But instead of complaining at the dispensation, or showing in any way that he preferred his own comfort to what God appointed for him to suffer, he said, "What! shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not also receive evil?" Job, indeed, had learned this great lesson, that God never does any thing, except with a view to glorify himself. If, therefore, it was appointed for him to suffer, God had done it for his own glory. In what way God was to obtain glory from it, Job did not stop to inquire; it was none of his business. All that he had to do, was to be satisfied with it, in the full conviction that an infinitely wise and good Being could not err. He was satisfied, and showed that he wished God to be glorified, whatever sorrow befel him. Truly, the law of God was written in Job's heart; and not without good reason does the Scripture say that he was a 'perfect' man. That good man sustained his examination with credit, and it is placed upon record "for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope."

THE "FOREKNOWLEDGE" DISCUSSION.

We give place to the subjoined communications, as showing how the termination of the recent discussion is viewed by the respective writers; and all we have to say is, that we think a great mountain has been made of a very small matter. Bro. Hull has full liberty to proceed; and, notwithstanding he seems to regard himself as restricted from doing so, except under "humiliating circumstances," we do not know that we can, consistently with a due respect for ourselves, do any thing more than to repeat what we have already said, that "if he feels that justice has not been done him, or that the cause of truth requires some farther elucidation of his views, the door is open." The "interference" and "censorship" of which he has complained, were like the interference and censorship of the writers of the communications below, which, being now on his behalf, ought to be regarded as balancing the account.

T. B. B.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

A remark or two I wish to make about the discussion on "Foreknowledge."

1st. I have not been able to see the propriety of the intimation that there exists any disposition among us to disallow your right to publish your sentiments as fully as you please. There are, indeed, those who think your views are just as far from truth as they can possibly be, and of course, that in proportion to your ability to give plausibility to them, such must be the measure of danger to the cause of truth; and I frankly own that I am one of that class. But I know of no cause from which truth suffers so much as from the want of the actual liberty of speech and of the press. I think, though some individuals may regard the discussion as unprofitable, it should go on. I think the majority of our people wish it continued till the points in question may be investigated. I find many who say they do not understand the subject—(and you will find this is much the case generally in community)—that it is new to them, but that they intend to examine it. And if it be as you have signified, that our denomination have no definite views on the point in hand, and that they have but little taste for metaphysics, (though I think they are a little more inclined that way than many,) then they should be exhorted to be patient and consider the subject, rather than be encouraged in turning away from it, or that we should give the matter over at their first manifestation of distaste for it.

2d. I see no reason for complaint on account of the space occupied by the discussion in the Recorder. The Recorder is not so crowded with matter which it is so imperiously necessary to publish as to require so much stress to be put on the question of space in its columns—at least, so it seems to me. I am at the same time proud (in an allowable use of that word) to say, that the Recorder is on the whole as well filled as any other paper. But it has been common with the conductors of our denominational papers, through past years, to call upon the members of our churches, and particularly our ministers, to write for the paper, because it was thought desirable to have a good share of the paper filled with original articles. I remember, too, that not long since the same thing was recommended to the brethren by one of the editors of the Recorder, at a quarterly meeting of our Publishing Society's Board. Now if, when our brethren undertake to write on subjects so important in the opinion of our editors as to require them to handle them in their leading articles, they must be put under restrictions which embarrass, and render it impossible to write with any liberty or freedom, it must unavoidably tend to impoverish the paper, so far as it might be improved by what they could do in writing for it. And then, to expect one writer to conform in his articles (especially in controversy) to just what his opponent may regard as proper limits or relevant argument, is what can not be done or looked for with reason, it seems to me. And further, who can tell what space would be just as much as propriety would allow for such a discussion? I had supposed, if correspondents did not exceed by their articles the space occupied by the writer on the other side, editor or whoever he might be, there could be no reason to say any thing on that point, unless it should be found that the discussion, as a whole, crowded on other interests; and then, instead of complaining of the other at all, they should mutually arrange that matter between them, and go on as fast as the circumstances would allow. The subject of the Sabbath has occupied a great deal of space in the Recorder, and our older papers—so much, that some of our people have complained, or signified that they thought it could be better filled with something else; but I have never been of that opinion. I do think, however, that there are other topics which we should give more attention to, though we give as much to that as we have done. And the subject of "Foreknowledge," is in my opinion one that demands our attention, both ministry and people; for though there are the names of great and good men that can be brought in support of the views you hold on this question, yet it is far from being true, (as would be inferred from what you have written,) that the mass of those who, going before us, have looked into that matter, hold as you do in regard to it.* I regret that the discussion has been interrupted as it has, and I hope Bro. Hull will resume it. I took the question up, because I feared he would not, except just to ask a few questions; and when I found him fairly in the field, I retired, for I thought he had the first claim to it. But I thought, when he should be through, I might have something more to say on the question. As it is, however, the subject is likely to go in part uninvestigated, I fear. The principal error in this case, I think, has been giving too much weight to the murmurs of individuals who have not duly considered the importance of the subject in debate, and thereby you and Bro. H. have both been driven from following your own views of what the case required, and your subject and yourselves together have become embarrassed.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

It appears that Bro. Hull feels admonished that the space he has occupied in the columns of the Recorder is thought to be more than belonged to him. This is just what I expected. The subject of the foreknowledge of Deity is vastly solemn, and ought to be even thought of with awe. If we had not been taught it in the Scriptures of Divine Truth, I should not think of saying or believing any thing about it. We are informed, that what is written was written for our instruction; hence to be understood. It is to be lamented, that some feel no interest on this great subject, and desire to have the discussion discontinued; for what reason I cannot imagine, unless they begin to feel that there is more difficulty in maintaining their stronghold than they have hitherto thought. Truth is never the sufferer in discussion; it is error that shrinks from agitation. Let us have the truth, the whole truth, in the love of God, and we have nothing to fear. I hope Bro. H. will feel at liberty to use his freedom, and continue his side of the discussion.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Sunday Railway Trains—Dissolution of Parliament—Baptismal Regeneration—Religious Liberty on the Continent.

Glasgow, March 19th, 1852.

This is the half-yearly term of Railway Meetings; and the Sunday observance question was again before the shareholders of the Caledonian Line, our most important railway in Scotland, at the meeting in London this day week. Mr. McMicking, one of the Directors, who had given intimation of his design, and printed a pamphlet untruly entitled, "The Sabbath Railway System practically discussed, by a Man of Business," made a long speech on introducing his motion, although he had widely circulated his pamphlet among the shareholders. He was heard with great impatience, and cries of "time," "nonsense," and continual stamping, indicated that his cause is gaining little by his efforts. He stated that an express train and a goods train run on Sunday mornings, "the excuse being, that the day begins when the bells ring for church." Such an "excuse" does sound odd enough; but it would not be easy to show that "the excuse" for beginning the day at 12 o'clock at night is better. He added, that they also run "four mail trains, while the Post-Office only requires us to run three."

Mr. W. Pare moved an amendment, that the Sunday trains be left to the regulation of the Directors. He said he could not think how those who were continually bringing forward such a motion could remain shareholders at all. He would have them to examine themselves on this point. "There would be as much propriety in a few Jews, who might happen to be shareholders, endeavoring to worry the Directors into a plan for shutting up the line on a Saturday." He might have said, that this would be much more in accordance with the injunction of the Fourth Commandment, which Mr. McMicking professes to obey, and quotes as his authority for the observance of a day of which it makes no mention.

Mr. D. Campbell, one of the directors, on seconding Mr. Pare's amendment, "proposed that the traffic should be increased rather than diminished, and he had no doubt it would be, so as to meet in a more efficient manner the wants of the community." Nor have we any doubt as to this being speedily effected—not so much on account of "the wants of the community," as the desire of gain. During the past half year, there have been 18,554 Sunday passengers carried on the main line, and for Sunday traffic during the same period £6,851 was received; the opening of their branch lines would probably double these results, during the summer months especially.

Mr. McM. would not be satisfied with a show of hands, but would insist on having a division, and begged that those favorable to his views would not leave the room till they had recorded their votes. The issue was ten for one against his Sunday observance motion—the most unfavorable decision that has yet been come to for his cause.

The same question was to have been discussed at the meeting of the North British Line, held yesterday in Edinburgh; it was, however, postponed on account of the absence of Mr. Blackadder, who had given notice of an intended motion to stop the Sunday trains on that line also.

The prospect of a dissolution of Parliament is stated to be exciting interest among the semi-Romish party of the Church of England on a new ground. The Record says, that "simultaneously with the election of Members of Parliament occurs the election of the Members of Convocation, and that any rector, vicar, and perpetual curate, has a voice in the election of those returned as Proctors" to that Assembly. The Queen's absolute supremacy over the Church of England has hitherto been so exercised as to make the Convocation a very harmless thing—meeting only to be dissolved. But, as the Record remarks, although we can see at present no advantage which the Puseyites contemplate in striving to send only men of their own kind, yet unforeseen changes may occur which will show in the effort thus made the cunning of the serpent.

Their "baptismal regeneration" views, so strongly put forth, operate unfavorably for them in another direction. There are men who have continued on in the Church of England as if they did not know some of its unscriptural views, who have been staggered by their being brought prominently before the public eye. One of these, the Rev. William Bathurst, has just left them, and joined either the Baptist or Independent denomination. He was rector of Barwick-in-Elmet, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, a living of which the exact emolument was £1,022 per annum.

On the Continent of Europe religious freedom is being further invaded. An announcement is just made, in a letter from Vienna, that there has been issued "a Ministerial Edict forbidding the meeting of the Anabaptists in certain of the Crown lands, that are not named." The printing office where the Bible was being printed in Hungary, has also been forcibly closed, and 900 Bibles have been seized.

FARMINGTON ACADEMY.

This institution, situated in the pleasant and flourishing village of Farmington, Fulton Co., Ill., closed its last term some two weeks since. The School was originated by Mr. James Hill, a consistent Sabbath-keeper, nearly three years ago, who has continued, except during a short period, its Principal until the present. Previous to his coming here, there was no school of a high character in town; but under his judicious management and able instructions, assisted by his brother, J. L. Hill, and others, it has grown into a highly respectable and flourishing academy, equal if not superior to any in this portion of the West. The students in the institution last term, numbered about one hundred, with every indication of its future increase in numbers, usefulness and success. The examination, of two days continuance, by the prompt answers and evidences of great advancement on the part of the students, was highly creditable both to them and their preceptors; while the exhibitions on each evening called out a crowded house of deeply interested spectators, though the time was very unfavorable, owing to the mud and excessive rains.

During the last summer and autumn, the Messrs. Hill erected, almost entirely at their own expense, a spacious and commodious brick building for the accommodation of the school, which, owing partly to a wish of Mr. James Hill to devote his time in preparation for the ministry, but mostly on account of the great stringency of money matters here, occasioned by the almost total failure of the crops last season, they were induced to sell, very recently, to members of the Congregational church. If the condition of our society here had been such as to afford them pecuniary assistance, such a result, so little consonant to their feelings, so generally regretted, and I fear so highly detrimental to us as a people, might have been avoided. By this we lose a very convenient place for holding our public meetings, a great source of influence, and a conspicuous position for making our principles known in the surrounding country. But amid all discouragements, though feeble in numbers, and somewhat scattered, I think the Sabbath-keepers here have no disposition to neglect the Christian ordinances, or abate their vigor in the vindication of the truth.

COLONIZING IN OREGON.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:—

In the Recorder of Feb. 26, 1852, I notice a well-prepared article on the subject of Colonization on the Pacific Coast by Seventh-day Baptists, from the hand of Dr. J. D. B. Stillman, who, I understand, has spent some little time in California. In that article, the peculiar circumstances of our denomination are truly stated, and very ably discussed; and a careful review of our history in America, I believe, will satisfy any one of the importance of the suggestions there laid before us. It is no doubt true, that the piety of our denomination has generally been respected within the narrow sphere of their acquaintance; but with few exceptions they have not been able to make their impress upon the escutcheon of civil and religious liberty. But few of our brethren have been called to fill "high places," or sit in the councils of the nation. The Wisconsin churches have probably enjoyed a larger share of liberality from the political world than any others. The reason why is easily understood. We had our ground taken at an early day, and our numbers were sufficient to give importance to our suffrages. Hence, when we asked an equitable representation, we could not be denied. Consequently, we have had our Constitution framed to protect not only ourselves in the free enjoyment of our religion, but liberty of conscience on the most liberal scale.

I am fully impressed with the importance of taking an early foothold wherever we plant ourselves, and moulding all the circumstances, as far as possible, after the fashion of the most exalted principles of civil and religious liberty. I agree with Dr. S., that the Mississippi Valley does not present the facilities for a mass settlement. We must look farther on; and the Pacific Coast is the first and only feasible position which offers itself to my mind. Among the many advantages which lie strewn over that extensive country, I am not at present prepared to judge, not having visited it. But for the last three years I have had uninterrupted correspondence with individuals in both Oregon and California, which has fully confirmed me in the opinion that many important positions may now be secured for colonization purposes or individual enterprise. Mr. Henry R. Stillman has been a resident of Clackamas Co., Oregon, since 1849; post-office address, Oregon City. Thos. L. Coon and Clarke P. Crandall have resided in Marion Co., Oregon, about one year; post-office address, Salem, Marion Co. Any person wishing to obtain information from that quarter can address them.

Impressed with the fullest confidence in the numerous advantages which offer themselves in that new country now opening for settlement, I have concluded to remove there, and am preparing to take leave of Wisconsin about the first of April, by way of the "plains," having under my escort three families, viz., my own, consisting of eight persons, two of whom are children; the family of Thos. L. Coon, now in Oregon, consisting of three persons, one of whom is a child; and the family of H. R. Stillman, of four, two of whom are children, and an extra driver—in all sixteen persons. Our outfit consists of four light wagons, with a team of three yokes of five-years old oxen, and one yoke of milch cows, to each wagon. Our loads consist of a few beds and bedding, a sufficient amount of clothing to last us through, and about 375 lbs. of provision (consisting of bacon, dried beef, crackers, flour, sugar, dried fruit, corn starch, rice, coffee, and tea) to each adult person. We expect to reach the frontier in one month, and Oregon in about five, from home. If Dr. Stillman, or others desirous of emigrating to Oregon, wish any information from me after my arrival in that country, they are invited to address me at Salem, Marion Co., and I will gladly furnish any information or other aid in my power to give.

Yours truly,

Paul Crandall.

SPIRITUAL MANIFESTATIONS.

"Spiritual Manifestations," so called, are becoming astonishingly plenty at the West. At Waukegan, in northern Illinois, it is said, a considerable part of the community have been entirely carried away with the delusion; and many have been led to contemn the Bible and all its legitimate teachings, giving themselves up wholly to the guidiance of communications from the other world, as delivered by "mediums." In other places, if we may credit the reports of the newspapers, the delusion is equally extensive. For the most part, the "manifestations" which relate to the interests and affairs of this world, are of a trivial or frivolous character, and not likely to injure any body, except as they occasion a waste of time, or create an unsettled state of mind. The "manifestations" which relate to the world to come, though professing to be of divine origin, are in many cases unworthy of the dignity of the divine character, or even of the proper dignity of man himself as a religious being. In other cases, they are contradictory of scripture, of right reason, and of each other. Under such circumstances, suspicion as to their origin and authority is natural and necessary.

One of the principal "mediums" at Waukegan, a Rev. Mr. Parsons, lately preached a sermon on the subject, in which he gives what seems to us a very rational explanation of the phenomena in the case. We copy from a report by the newspaper of that place:—

"Mr. Parsons gave a narration of his own experience in communicating with the 'spirits,' which was marvelous and exciting, and occasionally not a little amusing. Many of the communications—in fact, a majority of them—were voluntary, and characterized by remarkable intelligence. The speaker had presented before him at various times, visions and objects most beautiful and indescribable; these were perceptible at all times, nocturnally as well as during the day. Some of the communications were truthful, while many of them were not; some were orthodox, others infidel; but all seemed inclined to levity and frivolity; the best were even suspicious, inclined to flatter rathar rebuke, often approving what conscience would condemn. Some would acknowledge the truthfulness of the Bible, while others would condemn it. Some would at first appear reliable, and excessively friendly, and would lavish the medium with the most fulsome praise; this would excite his suspicion; his incredulity would provoke their displeasure, and in this way their true character would be drawn out. In all this investigation, the speaker remarked that he had looked for divine guidance, and never for a moment had his faith in Christ been shaken. These pretended revelations were in character with those devices which Satan had exhibited at different periods of the world, and of which Holy Writ had warned us. These 'spirits' had commended the doctrines of infidels, adulterers, and gamblers. In conclusion, he remarked, that his convictions were beyond a doubt, that all these 'mysterious rappings,' and all connected therewith, emanated from the Arch Deceiver."

We can not dismiss the subject without copying a paragraph from a report of revelations made by spirits at Unionville, Ohio., confirmatory of Mr. Parsons' main conclusion:—

"Are there different spheres for the abode of departed spirits? Answer, Yes. Can you tell us the number? Yes. Number them by raps. (Here were seven raps.) Are the spirits of those who are in these spheres in a state of progression in goodness and knowledge? Yes. Is progression in goodness in the spirit world dependent upon the actions or conduct of the spirits? No. Is it dependent only upon their capacity to progress? Yes. Do spirits in any of these seven spheres ever sin? No. Are they ever tempted to sin? No. Do the spirits of all persons who die enter some one of these seven spheres? No. Do the spirits of those who die impenitent ever enter into any of these spheres? No. Is it true that any portion of the human family will die impenitent? Yes. Will not the whole human family, after death, finally become holy and happy? No. Is the doctrine of future rewards and punishments, as taught by the different evangelical churches, the true doctrine? Yes. Will the future punishment of the wicked be endless? Yes. Is the misery of the wicked hereafter more intolerable than is described in the Bible? (Here were three raps, three times repeated.) Have not individuals received communications from the spirit world to the effect that all mankind would finally be made happy? Yes. Do such communications come from the spirits of good men? No. Do they come from the spirits of wicked men? No. Do they come from the devil? Yes.

AWFUL SABBATH ACCIDENTS.

"Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy. Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work, but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work."

On Sabbath-day, (the seventh day of the week, commonly called Saturday,) March 20th, the steamship Independence, of New Orleans, was wrecked on the bar of Metagorda Bay. She had on board a large number of passengers, of whom seven were drowned in attempting to reach the shore, viz: Mrs. Monot and three children, Mrs. Lieut. Jones, Mrs. Hovey, and the chief mate.

On Sabbath-day, (Saturday,) March 27th, at half past one o'clock, P. M., an unfinished building in New York fell down while the workmen were engaged upon it. Several persons were badly injured, three of whom have died. The following are the ages and places of nativity of the deceased, viz: John Rankin, 19 years, a native of Ireland; James Farrell, 33 years, a native of Ireland; John Brady, 26 years, a native of Ireland.

On Sabbath-day, (Saturday,) April 3d, at half past two o'clock, P. M., the steamer Redstone, running from Madison, Ia., to Cincinnati, O., with about seventy persons on board, including the boat's crew, blew up as she was backing out from Scott's landing, about three miles above Carrolton. The force of the explosion was terrific, and completely shattered the boat, which immediately sunk in twenty-feet water. "Of the passengers, a large proportion are lost, and of the crew only the captain and clerk are saved. The former is severely, if not fatally, injured. Up to 7 o'clock in the evening, fifteen dead bodies had been recovered in a horribly mutilated condition."

On the same afternoon, the steamer Glencove, from New Orleans, while making the landing at St. Louis, blew up with a terrible explosion, bursting all her boilers. "She had about one hundred and fifty passengers on board at the time, a large number of whom were killed. The steamers Cataract, Georgia, and Western, which were lying alongside at the time, sustained considerable damage. Several were also killed on board these boats. The number of the killed is not yet ascertained, but it must be very large. The Glencove took fire, and burnt to the water's edge."

Medical Missionaries.—A letter from H. M. Scudder, dated November 26, 1851, presents a strong argument for the combination of the practice of the healing art with preaching among the heathen. After adducing Scripture authority for such a course, he remarks:

1st. The union of preaching and healing harmonizes with the examples of Christ and the early disciples.

2d. The missionary, if a physician, attains thereby a happy introduction to the people.

3d. The physical benefits which the missionary physician confers, make the people more ready to hear his spiritual message.

4th. The missionary physician attracts to himself a daily assembly of adult persons.

5th. The missionary physician draws many females within the sphere of his labors.

6th. Medical practice wins for the missionary a portion of authority, fitted to subserve his higher office as a preacher.

Union College before the Legislature.—The Albany correspondent of the N. Y. Recorder says that the Investigation Committee in relation to the alleged embezzlement of the funds given by the State to Union College, have made a partial report; and from this and the speech of Senator Beekman, it appears that over two millions have been given, first and last, by the State to this one institution. "Without expressing an opinion as to the final result, I must say things now look rather squally for the managers of the College, and especially for its venerable President."

Education among the Methodists.—At a recent meeting of the Philadelphia Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, a report was presented on the proposition to endow Dickinson College. The report stated that the Methodist Church is doing only about one fourth as much for the cause of collegiate education as the other Protestant Churches—a humiliating fact, says the report, which should cease to exist. The Conference approved a plan for raising the endowment, and requested the Bishop to appoint a proper person to carry it out.

The Methodists and the Maine Law.—The Philadelphia Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, while in session at Philadelphia last week, laid upon the table a report on the subject of temperance, and the resolutions attached in favor of the Maine Liquor Law. The majority, it seems, deemed it "unadvisable to commit the Conference, as a Conference, upon this or any other political measure." They all, however, professed very heartily to approve of a prohibitory law.

American and Foreign Bible Society.—The Fifteenth Annual Meeting of the American and Foreign Bible Society is to be held in Cleveland, Ohio, on the 13th of May. Among the speakers announced to take part in the meeting are Rev. Drs. Neale of Boston, and Welch of Brooklyn, and Rev. Messrs. Magoon, J. L. Burrows, Cheney, Cressy, Miner, and Hamlin.

The Passover.—Last Sabbath the Jews of this city commenced the celebration of the Passover, which they continue seven days, living on unleavened bread, and holding frequent religious services.

Eld. Rowse Babcock wishes his correspondents to address him at Alden, Erie Co., N. Y.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, MARCH 29.

In the SENATE, a large number of petitions were presented; among them one from Rock County, Wisconsin, signed by men, women and children, praying for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law, which was laid on the table. Other petitions of the same kind were presented by Messrs. Seward and Hale, and tabled. The bill to indemnify the Amistad owners followed, and was entered on the calendar. Calls for information respecting Army Officers interested in Contracts, were ordered. The Committee on Foreign Relations was ordered to inquire into the expediency of remunerating Spanish citizens resident in Florida for loss of property from the Cuban expedition. The California Dry Dock was taken up and laid over. Mr. Cooper moved a reconsideration of the vote on admitting vestments for the Baltimore Nunnery free of duty. The American Coin Bill was ordered to a third reading. The President furnished information from the Home Department on the Capitol-enlargement, and an adjournment took place on the bill to increase judicial salaries.

In the HOUSE, the Navy Discipline bill, substituting imprisonment in irons, short allowances, &c. for the lash, was discussed all day.

THIRD-DAY, MARCH 30.

In the SENATE, numerous reports, resolutions and petitions were presented. The Coinage bill passed. The salary of the New-Hampshire District Judge was increased, and the Senate went into executive business.

In the HOUSE, the Homestead bill was discussed by Mr. Fuller of Me., in a speech against this beneficent measure, and by Messrs. Churchwell of Tenn., Grow of Penn., &c., in speeches in favor of it.

FOURTH-DAY, MARCH 31.

The SENATE received an unusually large number of petitions. Then followed a long talk about mail steamships, which used up the day.

In the HOUSE, perhaps half the day was taken up with a discussion of railroad grants, and the remainder with political speeches tacked on to the Homestead Bill.

FIFTH-DAY, APRIL 1.

In the SENATE, Mr. Rusk introduced a bill making a Land Grant to Mr. Whitney for his Pacific Railroad. The Japan Expedition inquiry was discussed at length and then postponed. An Executive Session wound up the day.

The HOUSE spent the day in discussing railroad grants and the Homestead Bill.

SIXTH-DAY, APRIL 2.

In the SENATE, several petitions were presented, and a bill was reported granting land to Indiana and Illinois, for the construction of a Railroad from opposite Louisville to opposite St. Louis. The bill granting preëmption rights to certain settlers on land purchased from the Menomenie Indians, was read a third time and passed. A report was made to the effect that the foundations of the Capitol have been examined by four officers of the United States Engineering Corps, and that they state there is no possible doubt of their sufficiency. The is therefore no reason why the work should be suspended any longer, and they suggest many reasons why it should go on at once. Adjourned to Second-day.

The HOUSE spent most of the day on private bills, twenty-one of which were reported and passed. Adjourned to Second-day.

Slave Case in New York.

The fourth case in New York under the Fugitive Slave Law was tried last week, and resulted in sending the alledged fugitive back to slavery. The facts are as follows: On Third-day, March 30th, a black man named Horace Preston, residing in Williamsburgh, earning an honest living hy his own work, and married to a woman most devotedly attached to him, was arrested by a police officer on a charge of stealing. He was locked up at a police station, and a telegraphic dispatch announcing his arrest was sent to a man in Baltimore who claims to be his master. That night a son of the claimant came on to New York, and the next morning a lawyer named Busteed made an affidavit, swearing positively and unequivocally to the slavery, the title, and the escape, thus making out the whole case. Preston's wife and counsel had been unable to get access to him until they met in the Court-room. They managed there to put in pleas which delayed the decision from time to time till Sixth-day afternoon. The proceedings from that point we copy from the Tribune of last Second-day:—

When the case was adjourned on Friday afternoon to Saturday morning, it was with the avowed understanding on the part of Preston's counsel, and assented to by the Commissioner, that if the latter should deny the motion made and argued by Mr. Jay to quash or dismiss the proceedings, then the counsel should go into their defense on the merits. To that end, several witnesses were in attendance; others had process out for them, to be served as soon as found. Some had known Preston in Baltimore, and were prepared to prove the declarations of his former mistress as to his freedom, and the provisions in her will to that effect. By others it was proposed to show the admission of the claimant, and others, to contradict Busteed's affidavit, and prove a conspiracy.

The Commissioner, instead of deciding the preliminary motion of Mr. Jay, and then stopping, took the counsel, the prisoner, and the audience by surprise. He decided the whole case—had his certificate in his hand—delivered it over in the twinkling of an eye—gathered up his papers, and retreated toward the back door of the room. It was all in vain that Messrs. Jay, Emmet, and Culver, jumped upon the floor, asking the Commissioner to hear them—urging their surprise, and the injustice done their client. Their efforts were all fruitless. The Commissioner refused to hear any thing further.

Mr. Culver was drawing an affidavit for Preston to attach a witness. His client, however, was taken suddenly from him, and removed to a back room in the Marshal's office. Mr. Culver at once applied to the Marshal for permission to go to the room and see his client, to have him sign an affidavit for a habeas corpus. His request was sternly denied—nor could he get sight of Preston again till he was brought out to be started off South.

Preston's counsel then applied to Judge Judson for a habeas corpus, but he could not hear the application.

Meantime the condemned man was got ready. His wife went in and had her last sad interview with him. Her cries and sobs were heard by the multitude outside.

We doubt if a more touching exhibition of the workings of the Fugitive Slave Law has ever been witnessed. The man's wife stood by her husband for three days, with a devotion and tenderness unparalleled. Whenever permitted to sit near him, she had fast hold of his hand in both of hers, wringing herself in the most intense, half-suppressed agony.

About 12 o'clock, the procession appeared from the back room, Gen. Henry F. Tallmadge, U. S. Marshal, in front; his sons, one on the right and the other on the left of the "Fugitive," and two sturdy Deputies of foreign birth behind. Each seemed satisfied with the honorable post he was permitted to take in doing the Slaveholder's work. The Fugitive was conducted out at the back door into Chambers-st., where a covered carriage was in readiness, into which he was put. The crowd, chiefly of colored people, rushed around, to catch their last view of their friend—some running to the carriage-door to shake hands, and bid good-by, some in tears, some in suppressed murmurs, some calling on God to avenge the wrong, and one devotional old woman was heard crying, "God'll punish 'em! God'll punish 'em!"

The carriage left, and at the time of writing this article, Horace Preston is back in Slavery for life. A woman robbed of her husband, and a little girl four years old of her father. So ends the fourth Fugitive Slave case in New York.

European News.

The steamship Canada, with one week later news from Europe, arrived at Boston on the 1st inst.

In the British Parliament, the opposition has opened a sharp fire upon the new Government, asking its intentions in every direction. The New Ministry had announced the intended dissolution of the Parliament. The country is wide awake for the new election, to be controlled by a few privileged voters.

An accident had occurred upon the South-Western Railroad, by which two lives were lost and many persons injured. The tire of one of the leading wheels of the locomotive flew off and threw the train from the track.

A house in Ladbrooke-square, Kensington, London, has been taken for M. Kossuth, whose family is expected to take possession on the 1st of May.

The small screw steamer, destined for the Arctic search by Captian Beatson, is ready. The proposed field of search is east of the meridian of Behring's Straits, toward Keller's discoveries in 1849, Herald Island, and New Siberia. Captain Beatson takes out autograph letters from the Emperor of Russia, recommending the expedition to the commanders of the Russian outposts at Siberia and other Muscovite settlements, and desiring them to promote the object in view to the uttermost of their power.

A letter has been communicated to The Times, dated Constantinople, Feb. 28, by the Captain of a Norwegian bark, in which he says that he saw the burning Amazon, but that she was a mass of flame when he came near, and that he sailed around her without finding any traces of the victims.

Spain is sending out a new Governor-General and more troops for Cuba.

Accounts from Vienna to the 15th March state that the Austrian war steamer Ananna had been stranded on an island off the coast of Dalmatia. She had a crew of 121 men, the dead bodies of 40 of whom had been recovered.

According to the last accounts from Algeria, the number of soldiers who perished in the terrible snow storm at Djema el Taount, or who have not since appeared, is 144. Among them is only one officer. The tents, provisions, &c., were destroyed, and an entire flock of sheep perished from the cold. The sufferings which the column endured were very terrible, and the obstacles they overcame would, under other circumstances, have almost been considered insurmountable. Some of the soldiers got intoxicated, and they were frozen to death as they staggered along; others perished from want of sufficient food.

The Overland Mail had arrived in London. It brought but little additional news respecting the Burmese War. The Governor-General was anxious to avoid further hostilities. The Persians had invaded Horat, and were likely to prove successful. The war continued in the South of China. A large piratical fleet had arrived off Ning-Po. British vessels were on the spot to render such assistance as might be necessary. Seventeen American whalers were in Hong-Kong Harbor. The fishing season had been unprofitable. The emigration of Chinese to California was greatly increasing.

A frightful massacre upon two English ships, the Victory, of London, and the Herald, of Leith, had taken place in the Chinese Seas. The Victory sailed with Coolies from some Chinese port to Callao. They rose on the way, killed the master, mate and cook, and then compelled one of the mates to steer the ship. They escaped, and Mr. Fogg, the mate, brought the vessel to Singapore. The Herald was homeward bound from Shanghai, with a crew of Manillamen, who became angry with the Captain for putting them on the customary allowance, and murdered him and the rest of the officers. They then deserted the ship, after scuttling her and locking the Captain's wife into the cabin, who was thus lost with the sinking vessel. The murderers have been arrested, and sent to Batavia to undergo the operation of the law.

The marriage of Jenny Lind has given great satisfaction in Hamburg, in which City the family of Mr. Goldschmidt reside. The news preceded the arrival of his own letters, and the report was treated as a joke until his parents received from Mr. Goldschmidt himself the tidings of its truth.

The last two passages (out and home) of the London packet-ship Northumberland, Capt. J. M. Lord, were made in thirty days.

California News.

The steamer Cresent City, from Chagres, with $1,500,000 in gold dust, 240 passengers, and two weeks later news from California, arrived at New York March 30th.

By this arrival we have intelligence of the total loss of the steamship North America, which vessel belonged to Mr. Vanderbilt, and was employed on the new line between San Juan and San Francisco. It appears that on the night of the 28th February, this splendid vessel ran on a sunken reef about 70 miles south of Acapulco. The night was fortunately calm and clear, which enabled all the passengers and crew to get ashore in safety. The vessel was bound from San Juan to San Francisco, and had on board about 800 passengers. These unfortunate people, with the crew, had made their way to Acapulco by land.

We give a summary of the fortnight's news, from San Francisco:—

The event of leading importance is the conflagration of Downieville. This occurred on the 21st of February. The fire broke out about 11½ o'clock at night, and spread with such rapidity as soon to reduce the town to ashes. Fortunately, the largest warehouses were located in the suburbs, which were saved. The loss is estimated to exceed $500,000.

The U. S. sloop-of-war St. Mary's, left San Francisco on March 1, direct for China, having on board the shipwrecked Japanese; Captain Magruder having instructions to deliver them over to the commander of the East India Squadron.

Perfect quiet now reigns in the Southern country. The Indians are beginning to come into the settlements. The Mormon settlement at San Bernadino is very prosperous. A severe hail storm recently visited San Isabel. The hail lay on the ground to the depth of a foot, an unusual occurrence.

Crime had alarmingly increased in San Francisco within the past month. Hardly a night passed that the most daring burglaries were not perpetrated in some part of the city, and notwithstanding the violence of public opinion against the robbers, and the certainty that if caught in their acts, the rascals would in all probability meet with instant death, they seem to grow more emboldened as they continue successful.

Considerable defalcations have lately come to light in the accounts of some of the public officers. The Treasurer of Calaveras County is said to have absconded with $30,000 of the public money; the Treasurer of Toulumne with another very large sum; and the Treasurer of Sacramento is accused of a similar offense. The securities of some, if not all of these men, are represented to be men of straw.

Two Sydney men, supposed to have been connected with an organized band of villains, committed a daring robbery at Murphy's Diggings, in Calaveras Co., on the 20th of February. They were arrested by the people, and promptly hung on the spot.

Several other cases of Lynching are reported. In one instance, four Indians were strung up. In another instance, two Americans were the victims.

The miners are complaining of the great lack of water. On this account, the product of their labors has not been as large as usual.

THE ART-UNION INJUNCTION DISSOLVED.—On Saturday morning, April 3d, at the sitting of the Special Session of the Superior Court, New York, Judge Duer announced his decision in the matter of James Gordon Bennett vs. The American Art-Union. The Judge was satisfied that the plaintiff, on the face of his complaint, had no title whatever to the relief which he sought, and consequently the temporary injunction is denied. The Judge explained at some length the legal reasons which he had for deciding that not only the plaintiff, but no subscriber to the Art-Union, is entitled to recover his investment in the manner sought in this case. As to the issue whether the Art-Union is a lottery, within the meaning of the prohibitory statute against games of chance, the Judge expressed no opinion, for the reason, that the plaintiff had no right to raise such an issue, the property of a lottery being vested in the State by the statute, and not in individuals. The Judge remarked, however, to the effect that he had formed an opinion, which, under circumstances requiring it, he should not hesitate to express; but at present he felt it to be his duty to refrain from expressing any opinion that might, by any possibility, have an influence on the judgment which it belongs alone to another tribunal to pronounce. HOW THE MAINE LAW WORKS.—Geo. St Maynard, City Marshal of Gardiner, Maine, (a manufacturing village of some 5,000 inhabitants on the Kennebec,) in his Annual Report, just made, says:—

"The Act entitled 'An Act for the suppression of drinking houses and tippling shops,' has been rigidly and quietly enforced, and its good effects may be seen in this City by any unprejudiced observer; and I believe the good order and quiet of our streets is mainly traceable to this fact. The whole amount of liquor seized is about twelve barrels, six of which have been destroyed.

"At the commencement of my official term of office, there were in this city fourteen places where intoxicating liquor was sold; some of them the habitual resort of drunken, riotous, and disorderly persons. But it is confidently hoped and believed that the keepers of these places have mostly, if not all, abandoned the traffic in spirituous liquors, from the fact that but one person has been convicted of drunkenness for the last four months, and but two have been committed to the watch-house for the last six months."

THE WAR IN BURMAH.—Late advices from Burmah announce the fact of the bombardment of Rangoon, by the British fleet, with great loss to the Burmese. It is stated that the British cammander invited all the foreign residents to take refuge on board the ships before the attack. A large number of these accepted the offer. Subsequently, the bombardment having been postponed a few hours, some sixty persons went ashore again, and were immediately made prisoners by the Burmese.

In Boston, on the 2d inst., Horace Linkum was arraigned for having in his possession lottery tickets with the intention to sell. He was held for trial in the sum of $20,000.

SUMMARY.

A bill has been offered in the Massachusetts Senate, by Mr. Sewall, providing for the appointment by the Governor of Commissioners, when any person in the State is arrested or seized, or in danger of being arrested or seized as a fugitive slave, on being informed thereof, diligently and faithfully to use all lawful means to protect, defend and procure the discharge of every such person; and also making it the duty of the State Courts, upon information being given of such an arrest, to issue a writ of Habeas Corpus, returnable to the Supreme Judicial Court; and if under this the person claimed is not discharged, he may appeal and claim a trial by jury.

In Philadelphia, March 30th, great alarm was created at the South-east Grammar School by some boys setting fire to some combustibles in the cellar. The teachers succeeded in dismissing the scholars without accident, and the fire was soon extinguished. It had been kindled immediately beneath the stairway, and but for the early discovery would have cut off the escape of 450 children.

The Fredericksburg (Va.) News relates the case of a man named David Alman, who died recently at the Poor-House in that place, aged ninety-three years. He came to Fredericksburg more than fifty years ago. For a long time he was wealthy, was a member of the Town Council, and once Mayor. In his old age he became impoverished, and the last fifteen years of his life were spent in the Poor-House.

Twenty-two colored persons, residing in New Jersey, have applied to the American Colonization Society for a passage to Liberia, and it is expected that they will go out in the Society's vessel, which is to sail from Baltimore May 1. It will require the whole of the State appropriation the present year ($1,000) to pay the expenses of this company. Other companies are preparing to emigrate.

The Bay State Mills have ceased to manufacture Shawls, and are now engaged in the manufacture of Carpets, imitating the Brussels designs by "compressing woollen rags together as paper is formed of cotton, and imprinting the colors and figures of the real Brussels thereon." It is stated that the imitation is so good as to deceive all but manufacturers.

The Hudson River was closed the present season 102 days, being twelve days more than the average of the 67 years from 1785 to 1852. The longest time of suspension of navigation on record is 136 days, in 1842–3—the shortest in 1805–6, 42 days. The boats are now plying regularly on the river, the morning and evening lines having both commenced operations.

A destructive conflagration occurred at St. Bartholomew, W. I., March 2d, destroying 120 houses and stores, leaving a great number of people without shelter and entirely deprived of the means of support. St. Bartholomew is a small island of the Antilles, belonging to Sweden, and containing about 2,000 inhabitants, without any domestic resources.

A Temperance Convention was held at New London, Ct, March 26th, with B. W. Tompkins for President, and S. S. Griswold for Secretary. Addresses in favor of the Maine Liquor Law were made by Rev. Mr. Peale of Maine, Mr. Wagner, Rev. Mr. Foote, and B. F. Trumbull, Esq.

BENEDICT W. ROGERS, Treasurer.

MARRIED,

In Alfred, N. Y., March 30th, 1852, by Daniel Potter, Esq., Mr. IRA PIERCE to Miss MARTHA CRANDALL, all of Alfred.

In Hopkinton, R. I., in the evening after the Sabbath, March 27th, by Eld. C. M. Lewis, Mr. JOSEPH R. ALLEN, of North Stonington, Ct., to Miss SUSAN KENYON, of the former place.

By the same, at Hope Valley, R. I., March 28th, Mr. HENRY C. CLARKE to Miss MARY J. WILSON, both of Hopkinton.

By the same, in Hopkinton, R. I., March 28th, Mr. HENRY L. LARKIN, of Hopkinton, to Miss MARY E. POTTER, of Richmondtown.

DIED,

In Westerly, R. I., March 30, 1852, Mr. ZEBULON STILLMAN, in his 68th year. He was born in Westerly, June 21st, 1784. In early life, he learned the trade of a house-carpenter of his father, Deacon Joseph Stillman, with whom he made it his home until he was married in Nov., 1810. Soon after this he became crippled, and for a time not able to do much. Being naturally very industrious, and not willing to be idle, after he partially recovered from the effects of a broken limb, he built (it is believed) the first one-horse wagon ever built in Washington County. Not being able to pursue his former occupation, he subsequently followed his new business of wagon-making most of his time; and about 1825, in connection with that, he introduced the first cast-iron plow ever used in the counties of Washington, R. I., and New London, Ct. Some of those plows are still in use, and are generally known as Stillman's Plows. This business he followed until 1839, when, in consequence of his infirmities, he relinquished it. Since that time one of his sons has succeeded him in the same occupation, with whom he has made it his home since the death of his wife in 1841.

Mr. Stillman was a man generally known and highly esteemed in this section of the country. During his life he has been laid up four times with broken bones, and has suffered very much from sores on one of his legs for the last thirty years or more. For the last eight years, in addition to his other infirmities, he has suffered much from a cancer on one of his lips. He was able to be about until two or three days before his death; and while he and his friends were looking forward with apprehensions that his sufferings would be both increased and protracted, he was unexpectedly and peacefully removed by a disease of the heart, combined with paralysis, which produced a state of unconscious helplessness.

It should be added, that the subject of this notice made a profession of religion not far from 20 years since, and united with the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church of Hopkinton, R. I. The vital principle of the religion he professed was exhibited in his subsequent life, and particularly in the fortitude and resignation with which he bore his multiplied afflictions; from which he has doubtless been released to inherit the rest of the people of God.

In Verona, N. Y., March 29th, of consumption, Mr. HARRISON J. WILLIAMS, aged 37 years He was a member of the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Verona. He made a profession of religion in early life, and was a consistent follower of Christ. His health had been on the decline for about ten years. For several weeks he was wholly confined to his house. During his protracted illness, he was not heard to utter a murmuring word. In his last moments he was heard to say, "Now I can fearlessly launch away; my Saviour is reaching forth his hands to conduct me through the valley and shadow of death." He has left an amiable wife, seven interesting children, a number of brothers and sisters, and a large circle of friends, to mourn their loss. "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace." Psalm 37: 37. C. C.

In New Market, April 2, 1852, ALEXANDER CLAWSON, son of Deacon Isaac Clawson, aged eleven years. Some months ago he fell from a wagon, striking upon the back of his head. From that time he often complained of a pain in his head, until he was obliged to abandon his studies and his school. Still no particular alarm was felt, until about ten days before his death, when his physician pronounced his disease fatal. He was soon deprived of reason; and continued in great agony and distress until his final departure. He was a boy beloved by his friends and associates, and especially by his schoolmates; and about forty of the boys of the school, near his own age, attended his funeral in procession as mourners, and some of them appeared to feel that they had lost a beloved associate and friend.

In Williamsburgh, L. I., March 30, 1852, CHARLES E., son of Nicholas and Cynthia H. Rogers, aged 17 months and 12 days.

This lovely bud, so young and fair,
Called hence by early doom,
Just came to show how sweet a flower
In Paradise would bloom.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

The Sabbath Recorder,

Published Weekly.

Terms—$2 00 per Annum, in Advance.

The Sabbath Recorder is devoted to the exposition and vindication of the views and movements of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. It aims to promote vital piety and vigorous benevolent action, at the same time that it urges obedience to the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. Its columns are open to the advocacy of all reformatory measures which seem likely to improve the condition of society, diffuse knowledge, reclaim the inebriate, and enfranchise the enslaved. In its Literary and Intelligence Departments, care is taken to furnish matter adapted to the wants and tastes of every class of readers. As a Religious and Family Newspaper, it is intended that the Recorder shall rank among the best.

The New England Pompkins.

AN AUTUMNAL SONG.

BY J. G. WHITTIER.

Oh! greenly and fair in the lands of the sun,
The vines of the gourd and the rich melon run,
And the rock, and the trees, and the cottage enfold,
With broad lands all greenness, and blossoms all gold,
Like that which o'er Nineveh's prophet once grew,
While he waited to know that his warning was true,
And longed for the storm-cloud, and listened in vain,
For the rush of the whirlwind and red fire's rain.

On the banks of the Yenil the dark Spanish maiden
Comes up with the fruits of the tangled vine laden;
And the Creole of Cuba laughs out to behold,
Through orange leaves shining, the broad spheres of gold;
Yet with dearer delight from his home in the North,
On the fields of his harvest, the Yankee looks forth,
When crook-necks are coiling and yellow fruit shines,
And the sun of September melts down on his vines.

Ah!—on Thanksgiving Day, when from East and from West,
From North and from South, come the pilgrim and guest,
When the grey-haired New Englander sees round his board
The old broken links of affection restored;
When the care-wearied man seeks his mother once more,
And the worn matron smiles where the girl smiled before,
What moistens the lip and what brightens the eye?
What calls back the past like the rich pumpkin pie?

Oh!—fruit loved of boyhood! the old days recalling,
When wood grapes were purpling and brown nuts were falling;
When wild ugly faces were carved in its skin,
Glaring out through the dark with a cnadle within!
When we laughed round the corn heap with hearts all in tune,
Our chair a broad pumkin—your lantern the moon,
Telling tales of the fairy who traveled like steam,
In pumkin shell coach with two rats for her team!

Then thanks for the present—none sweeter or better,
E'er smoked from an oven or circled a platter!
Fairer hands never wrought a pastry as fine,
Brighter eyes never watched o'er its baking than thine!
And the prayer, which my MOUTH is too full to express,
Swells my heart that thy shadow may never be less,
That the days of thy lot may be lengthened below,
And the fame of thy worth like a pumpkin vine grow,
And thy life be as sweet, and thy last sunset sky
Gold-tinted and fair as thy own pumpkin pie!

Hard Water.

What waters are pure—From whence natural hard water is produced—The cause—The philosophy of cleansing—Its effects—Error in the use of lime—Its benefits and virtues.

None of the waters produced by nature are entirely pure and soft—artificially distilled water alone is so, and often then, without care and some chemical knowledge of the process, it is not free from impurities.

The waters from primitive formations, particularly from mountainous districts, are almost pure, and springs and wells on sandy plains are nearly—owing to the rocks and soils being wholly composed of silicious and other constituents, insoluble in water. All streams and springs in secondary, or limestone countries, contain more or less materials constituting what is called hard water—and often the waters from sudden showers, which have been produced by evaporation from extensive regions of like formation, are sensibly affected.

All waters known as hard, result from some of the acids or their salts being held in solution. The most common are the carbonic acid and the carbonates, and sulphurous and chloric acids and their combinations. All the waters containing carbonic acid gas, and sulphuretted hydrogen, (the material that makes the sulphur springs of the country,) uncombined with the earths, are rendered soft by simple boiling, as the gases are expanded by heat and thrown off, and no deposit is left—but when united with lime, alumina (clay) or the metals, boiling deposits a portion by releasing the solvent, in the form of a hard stony concretion.

The process used by washing-women, to cleanse the hard water by adding lye, ashes, or potash, is a strictly correct chemical process. Acids, and alkalies are antagonistical principles; one destroys or neutralizes the other, and renders both inert and harmless. The sulphuretted waters are more difficult to cleanse, or purify, than any other class except the muriates (acid of common salt, how called chlorates,) as they adhere to their combinations with greater tenacity.

The effect produced on hard water in washing, where soap is used, is very simple when investigated. Soap is a compound of an alkali and animal fat, or vegetable oils and resins, and when added to water containing any acid, or acidulated substance, the acid, by its chemical affinities, seizes and neutralizes the alkali of the soap, disengaging the fatty substance in the same shape it was originally, and in the worst possible shape for cleansing the person or clothing.

There is a vulgar error prevailing among the people generally, that it is dangerous to add lime to wells and cisterns, on account of its rendering the water hard. There is no greater fallacy among our traditionary belief. Lime is strictly an alkaline substance, and as such, is a neutralizer of all the acids that water contains, and may be freely used when in a quick or unslacked state—old and airslacked is hurtful, as it has become a sub-carbonate. One ounce of fresh quick lime, dissolved in water, will soften two barrels of ordinary hard water, and render it fit for washing purposes. It is also advantageously used to sweeten cistern water when it becomes stagnant, and of bad odor, and the cheapest and most ready deodizer of all unpleasant, unhealthy effluvia. [Rural New Yorker.

Forty Miles an Hour.

A correspondent of the Albany Journal, in an article under the title of "Railroad Accidents, and Legislation thereon," speaking of forty miles an hour, says:—

"Men who are used to the railroad, and to the working of the rolling stock, know what such a rate of speed is, and how wonderful is the operation. Let us examine. An engine, tender, and train of four passenger cars and one luggage car, when properly loaded, will not be much less than eighty tons weight. This body, at the rate of forty miles an hour, moves about sixty feet in a second. That is, between two beats of a clock, it flies across a common street. The driving wheels, if six feet in diameter, revolve three times in a second. The common wheels of the cars revolve about eight times in a second. The revolutions of the driving wheels are produced by the motion of the piston in the cylinder. To each revolution of this wheel there are two motions of the piston. Thus there are six motions of the piston to the second, and at each of these motions a valve is opened or closed, for the taking or exhausting steam from the cylinder. This must be a complete and perfect operation each time, to produce the speed. But there are two cylinders working at opposite sides of the engine, and at different points of the crank of the wheel or axle, as may be, and they do not move at the same instant, or rather, they alternate, and thus each performing the same office, they divide a second into twelve equal parts or periods, in each of which the perfect and complete operation of taking or exhausting steam is performed, and at the end of each motion the piston actually stops and turns the other way. Now the eye could not count or comprehend these motions.

The ear could not distinguish the exhausts, though each is as perfect and distinct as when the engine is drawing a heavy load four or five miles an hour, when it seems to labor and cough as if struggling with its load. Thus is a speed of forty miles an hour analyzed.

Now must there not be very greatly increased liabilities to accident at such a rate of speed? Who can see the strains upon parts of the machinery that may result in a fracture when moving at this rate?"

The Monkeys and Organ-Grinders.

With the return of warm weather, a horde of monkeys and organ-grinders are annually let loose upon our citizens. We have often wondered where they came from and whither they went. Their place of rendezvous we have at length discovered. A lofty building in Orange-street, evidently designed by the builder as the abode of comfort and elegance, has been for some period in the complete occupancy of these creatures. The threshold crossed, the organs of scent, sight, and hearing—the fumes, the filth, the screeches—leave no doubt of the character of the place. Each apartment forms the abode of both man and monkeys; and it would require no great stretch of imagination in the visitor to suppose some of the inmates representatives of those interior African tribes who are said to possess tails. In the lower rooms, Jacko was generally restricted in his perambulations by a short chain; but in the attic and upper apartments, where the monkey tribe greatly predominated over the genus homo, the animals occupied boxes about a foot square, having apertures for ventilation, and to admit food, and were bereft of companionship. In other cases, the monkeys are made to occupy small closets, partitioned off into small compartments. In one room thus occupied, in part, were three bedsteads, overspread with tattered and filthy quilts, whereon slept, at night, six or nine individuals, of both sexes. Adjoining, was an apartment where, among swinging cobwebs and the sooty accumulations of a decade of years, was to be seen the whole apparatus of street music—managers, monkeys, and organs—for the weather was unpropitious for the prosecution of the fine arts. Our sudden entrance taking them by surprise, a group of men around a table pushed from sight the cards with which they were playing, and curiously eyed the visitors. One of them then proceeded to show off a favorite monkey, which he said was worth "tree hundred tollar." The ordinary price ranges from $25 to $50. Close by the card-players, an aged couple, with haggard visages, were gracelessly stretched out, faces upward, over a heap of hand-organs and boxes—heavily slumbering.

During the interview which ensued, various information was elicited. The receipts of organ-players are now small, compared with former years, on account of the great competition in the business; but it is not unusual for these vagrants to make a $1 00 or even $1 50 a day. The monkeys are imported, but their constitutions are unable to bear up under the rigors of winter in these high latitudes, and they are obliged to spend the most inclement part of the season in the Southern States. There are at present but few monkeys in the city, in consequence of this temporary absence. The cold weather has the effect to induce rheumatic pains, cramp in the stomach, diarrhea, &c., attended with loss of flesh. The city does not hold out so great inducements to itinerant organists as the country—the former being far less liberal in its patronage.

Monkeys are not at all fastidious as to the nature of their food. The hand-organs are generally owned by the performers, and are manufactured abroad. There are instances in which they are the property of some capitalist included in the fraternity, who hires them out for a certain per centage of the profits. The performers are chiefly from Italy; and though, in the instance here referred to, living together in considerable numbers, associate rather from instinct than interest. As the money-musical season will recur with the recommencement of warm weather, and the consequent return of the monkeys from their Southern tour, the pecuniary result is looked forward to with no ordinary interest.

Effects of Education on the Robin.

The most remarkable instance I ever remember to have met with of a young pupil not only imitating, but far surpassing his tutor, was about nine years ago, in Jermyn street, Haymarket. At that period I reveled in the undisturbed enjoyment of a large aviary, numbering no fewer than three hundred and sixty-six inhabitants, all first-rate songsters; and my fame as an amateur had spread widely. Among the multitude of my visitors was a gentleman who informed me that a friend of his was possessed of a most wonderful bird, that he should much like me to see and hear. I took the address, and went at an early day to view the prodigy. On entering the house referred to, and on presenting my card, I was at once ushered into the drawing-room. I there saw two cages—nightingale cages—suspended on the wall. One of them, with a nightingale in it, had an open front; the other had a green curtain drawn over the front, concealing the inmate. After a little discourse on the subject of ornithology, my host asked me if I should like to hear one of his nightingales sing. Of course, I was all expectation. Placing me beneath the cage, and drawing up the curtain before alluded to, the bird above, at a whistle from his master, broke out in a succession of strains that I never heard surpassed by any nightingale. They were indeed surprisingly eloquent. "What a nightingale!" ejaculated I. The rapid utterance of the bird, his perfect abandon to the inspiration of his muse, and his indifference to all around him, caused me to involuntarily exclaim, with Coleridge:

> ——That strain again!
> Full fain it would delay me.

And so it did. I stood riveted to the spot, knowing how seldom nightingales in a cage so deported themselves. After listening some time, and expressing my astonishment at the long-repeated efforts of the performer—so unusual, I asked to be allowed a sight of him. Permission was granted; the curtain was raised, and I saw before me—a robin! This bird had been brought up under the nightingale from his very earliest infancy, and not only equaled, but very far surpassed his master in song. Indeed, he put him down and silenced him altogether. This identical bird, I should add, was sold a few weeks afterwards for nine guineas; he was worth the money. In this case, the robin retained no one single note of his own, whereby the finest ear could detect him; and this paves the way to still more singular discoveries hereafter. [Chronicle.

A Slave Hunting for a Master.

Four young men arrived here, last week, (says the Voice of the Fugitive, Canada,) from the land of slavery, one of whom was from Frankfort, Kentucky. His master had been the keeper of a livery stable for several years, but had at length sold out his establishment, with the exception of this faithful servant, who was his principal ostler. He told the slave that he had no further use for him after the establishment was sold, and that he was to be sold also; but for his fidelity to him during the whole time that he had kept the stable, he would give him an opportunity to go out and find himself a master, such an one as he would like to live with. But the next day his master came home accompanied by a negro trader whose business was to purchase him. He was called out and examined, just as a horse jockey would examine a horse before trading for him; and the only thing that saved him from the chain gang, was the extraordinary price put upon him by his master. After the soul-driver was gone, he called his master's attention to his promise, which was to allow him the privilege of finding himself a new master. Yes, said the master, I have said that you should have this privilege, and I will not be worse than my promise. So he wrote the slave a pass, and started him out to find a master; but, as he neglected to restrict his boundary, he strayed off into an adjoining county, where he found another slave out on the same errand, where they united in hunting masters, but never succeeded in finding one to suit them until the Canadian line was drawn between them and the State of Kentucky. Here they have resolved to serve but one master, who is the great Author of the Universe.

Roads and Schoolmasters.

Relative to Roads and Schoolmasters, as the forerunners of civilization, Mr. Senator Sumner spoke as follows:—

"Where roads are not, civilization cannot be; and civilization advances as roads are extended. By these, religion and knowledge are diffused; intercourse of all kinds is promoted; the producer, the manufacturer, and the consumer, are all brought nearer together; commerce is quickened; markets are opened; property, wherever touched by these lines, is changed, as by a magic rod, into new values; and the great current of travel, like that stream of classic fable, or one of the rivers of our own California, hurries in a channel of golden sand. The roads, together with the laws of ancient Rome, are now better remembered than her victories. The Flaminian and Appain ways—once trod by returning proconsuls and tributary kings—still remain as beneficent representatives of her departed grandeur. Under God the road and the schoolmaster are the two chief agents of human improvement. The education begun by the schoolmaster is expanded, liberalized, and completed by intercourse, and finds new opportunities and inducements in every road that is built."

Starch Making.

One of the most extensive manufacturing establishments in the country is the Starch Factory of Messrs. Thomas Kingsford & Son, at Oswego, N. Y. The ground covered by the building is more than two acres in extent, and the number of persons in Oswego and vicinity attached to the concern, and whose employment depends on it, exceeds two hundred. It was commenced in 1847, and so rapidly has the demand for its products grown, that it has been found necessary to enlarge the works every year since, until they have attained their present magnitude. The past year the establishment has turned out 80,000 boxes of Starch, containing three millions of pounds. In the manufacture of this quantity 200,000 bushels of grain were used.

How Indigo is Prepared.

The indigo is a shrub-like plant, two or three feet high, with delicate blue-green leaves, which, at the harvest-time, about the month of August, are cut off close to the stem, tied into bundles, and laid in great wooden tubs. Planks are then laid on them, and great stones, to cause a pressure, and then water is poured over them, and after a day or two the liquor begins to ferment. In this process of fermentation lies the principal difficulty, and everything depends on allowing it to continue just the proper time. When the water has acquired a dark green color, it is poured off into other tubs, mixed with lime, and stirred with wooden shovels till a blue deposit separates itself from the water, which is then allowed to run off. The remaining substance, the indigo, is then put into linen bags, through which the moisture filters; and as soon as the indigo is dry and hard, it is broken into pieces and packed up. Indigo is cultivated in the East Indies to a considerable extent.

DISEASE PROPAGATED BY BANK NOTES.—Dr. Thomas H. Buckler, who was for several years physician to the Baltimore Almshouse, says:—

"Since the money pressure of 1837, the banks in many of the States have issued several millions of one, two, and three dollar notes, the effect of which has been to drive silver out of circulation. The inmate of a small-pox hospital generally keeps what money he may chance to have about his person. If he wants a lemon, he sends a note saturated with the poison, and having, perhaps, the very sea-sick odor of the small-pox, to a confectioner, who takes it of course. On leaving the hospital, the convalescent from the loathsome disease pays some twelve or fifteen dollars for board. Provisions are wanted for the other patients, and the notes are sent to market, where they are taken by town and country people, and may pass through twenty different hands in a single day. It would be impossible to conceive of any better mode of distributing the poison of a disease known to be so very contagious and infectious. It could hardly be worse if so many rags were distributed from the clothing of small-pox patients."

INDIAN HAIL STORM.—The following accounts have been collected by Dr. Buist of Bombay. Within the topics, hail-storms frequently occur at altitudes of 1,700 feet and upward; they are most frequent in April and March. At Kotah, on the 5th of March 1827, the hailstones were as large as a man's fist. Men, animals, and birds were killed; in the village of Nada alone, six persons were killed and seven dangerously bruised. At Serampore, in April, 1829, the hailstones were as large as hen's eggs, and consisted of coats like an onion. At Kamptee, in April, 1831, there were hailstones twelve inches in circumference; five persons were killed. At Benares, in February, 1836, some of the masses of ice which fell weighed two pounds. At Dum Dum, April, 1836, two hailstones were picked up of sixteen inches circumference, or more than five inches in diameter. At Gwabor, in February, 1850, pieces of ice fell nearly two pounds in weight, and animals and men were killed. At Condweil, 7th April, 1850, some single hailstones were as large as cocoa-nuts.

LONDON NEWSPAPER PRESS.—The returns of the English Stamp Office, published in the London Times of the 1st March, give some extraordinary statistics relative to the London newspaper press. By these returns it appears that the circulation of that great journal, the Times, exceeds by over 4½ millions of copies, the aggregate circulation of all the other London newspapers put together, both morning and evening. It is in fact conceded, that most of the London morning newspapers are published at a loss, while the profits of the Times are known to exceed $500,000 a year. The Times pays for stamp, advertisement and excise duty, about $500,000 a year to the Government. The daily circulation of the London papers is now about as follows: Times, 40,000; Morning Advertiser, 5,000; Daily News, 3,000; Morning Herald, 3,000; Morning Chronicle, 2,900; Morning Post, 2,800. Most of these papers are falling off in their circulation yearly, and the evening journals are in a still worse position.

PROTECTION OF TIMBER AGAINST THE SEA-WORM.—Timber exposed in marine works is bored by the teredo, whose head is armed for that purpose, and it is soon reduced to the appearance of sponge. Worms three feet long and one inch in diameter have been found in piles of fir, their favorite wood. At Southampton, piles of 14 inches square have been eaten down to 4 inches in four years. Experiments have been made by Mr. Brunel and others to protect the wood by creosoting it, and their efforts have been very successful. Lately, a piece of creosoted timber has been taken out perfectly sound, after a seven years' immersion, when all the unprepared timber adjoining was more or less injured by the teredo. The cost of preparation is 6d. per cubic foot, while the cost of casing it with large-headed iron nails, which is also effectual, costs 11d. per square foot of surface. This latter price corresponds to 44d. per cubic foot for ordinary timber 12 inches square.

TEA BEST IN THE EVENING.—Tea, as the morning beverage, when breakfast forms a good, substantial meal, upon which the powers for the day, of meeting the various chances and changes of life depend, provided it be not too strong, is much to be recommended; but when individuals eat little, coffee certainly supports them in a more decided manner; and, besides this, tea, without a certain quantity of solid aliment, is much more likely to influence the nervous system. Some persons, if they drink tea in the morning and coffee at night, suffer much in the animal spirits and in power of enjoyment of the pleasures of society; but if they reverse the system, and take coffee in the morning and tea at night, they reap benefit from the change; for the coffee, which to them in the morning is nutritious, becomes a stimulus at night; and the tea, which acts as a diluent at night, gives nothing for support during the day. [Sigmond.

EARLY PLANTING OF POTATOES.—The best way to escape the rot and the potatoe bug, is to plant your potatoes as early as the last of March or first of April; put a little lime in each hill when planting. I have planted my early potatoes in this way for the last five years, and none of them have ever rotted. I have always planted some in May, every year for several years, (without liming,) and they have always rotted, more or less.

But putting lime in the hills will not prevent the bugs from eating off the tops; neither will sprinkling lime on the tops put a stop to their gormandizing. But if you plant very early, your potatoes will be of good size before the bugs make their appearance, and you will have potatoes in spite of the bugs. While those planted late are attacked at the same time, they will scarcely be worth digging, as they grow none after the tops are destroyed. [Robt. Stevens.

NEW MODE OF ROBBERY.—Some abandoned parents, (whose love of rum has involved them in poverty and degradation, and who now exist from the proceeds of the begging and stealing of their poor children,) have taught their offspring a new mode of theft, which was performed in the following manner a day or two since: A little girl, the daughter of ex-Alderman Wood, and also a daughter of J. P. Martin, both aged about six years, were accosted by a girl of 14 or 15 years old, who told them she had two nice dolls, the one a wax one, and the other a china one, and that if the children would give her their shawls to wrap them up in, she would go home and fetch them, and make them a present of the toys. Child-like, the little girls did so, and as might be expected, the thief never made her re-appearance, and the children came home crying without their shawls.

FREEZING OF VEGETABLES.—Contrary to general opinion, freezing is not necessarily destructive of life in vegetables. At Charles Island, in Hudson's Bay, according to Captain James, the trees had to be thawed by fire before they could be cut down, and there is no doubt that the roots are as well frozen as the stem, since vegetation prospers in Siberia, where the following observations have been made: A well was dug 400 feet deep, and the temperature at 50 feet was 18° Fahr., at 77 feet 19°, at 119 feet 22°, at 300 feet 28°, at 382 feet 31°. At this place the soil is frozen to the depth of 400 feet; the cold reaches 52° below zero, and the mean temperature of the two winter months is 40° below zero. During the 128 days during which there is no frost, the strata of eternal ice are never thawed to a greater depth than 3 feet.

NEW SUBSTITUTE FOR OIL.—A new illuminating fluid has been developed, which will, in a great measure, supersede spirit lamps, as soon as the patent office can settle its doubts. Large manufactories of honzule, a hydro-carbon, which has the property of producing an excellent illuminating gas by being dissolved in moist air, are going up in New York and Brooklyn. The substance is manufactured from tar or mineral coal, and, while it can be afforded at half the price of "burning fluid" per gallon, it will yield indefinitely more illumination. The use of it would require a gasometer and gas fixtures in each house, but the cheapness of the consumption would put moveable lamps of every kind nearly out of use.

THE POTATO-ROT—ANOTHER PREVENTIVE.—Plant your potatoes in the usual way, and when the sprouts appear above ground, take from one half to a bushel to dry (wood) ashes per acre, and sow it broadcast over the ground, while the dew is on. Repeat the ashes every seventh day until the crop is made; and if proof by actual experiment is to be relied on, your potatoes will be free from rot.

VARIETY.

The man, named Castaneda, who captured Lopez, has returned to Havana, laden with honors. The Queen gave him $6,000, and made him a captain in the rural militia with a salary of $110 a month; ten negroes and a tract of land have been given to him. The order of Isabel decorates his person; his children are to be educated at the expense of the Government; and while in Spain he was permitted the farce of kissing the hands of the Queen and the little Princess. He can neither read nor write.

Thomas Moore was buried at the village of Bromham, within a mile of the cottage in which he breathed his last. He was placed, in obedience to his wish, in the same grave with one of his daughters. The village church was crowded with the poor of the neighborhood, and the rector of the adjacent village came to pay the last tribute of regard to an old friend. But beyond this gentleman and Mr. Longman, the publisher, there were none who had known the poet in life to offer him personal respect in death.

The museum of Dr. Abbot, of Cairo, consisting of the rarest and most curious specimens of ancient Egyptian art and life, and which is well known to every traveler in Egypt, has been shipped at Alexandria for the United States. This collection is one of the most valuable of its kind in the world. Those of the British Museum and of the King of Prussia are more extensive, but are hardly more choice. Among other remarkable objects in Dr. Abbot's collection is the seal ring of Cheops, the supposed builder of the great Pyramid.

The Board of Overseers for Harvard University have resolved "that it is expedient that the connection between the Theological School at Cambridge and the University, should be entirely dissolved, and that the President and Fellows be and are hereby requested to cause such legal steps to be taken as may be necessary to effect the said separation and the removal of the School from Cambridge."

There are in the State of Indiana, among all denominations, 1900 houses of worship. Number of communicants in all evangelical churches, about 124,000. 1 in 7 of her adult population can neither read nor write; 1 in 8 of the families is without the Bible; 1 in 8 of the population is a professor of religion; 1 in 75 dies annually. The Baptists have 300 preachers, 600 churches, and 26,000 communicants.

The whole number of Germans in the United States is estimated at 5,000,000, being over one-fifth and nearly one-fourth of the whole population of the country, which is estimated at 23,000,000. Of these five millions of Germans, nine-tenths are in the free States. Missouri is the only slave State in which they have settled in any considerable number.

The number of Non-Conformist Chapels in England, belonging to some fifteen or sixteen denominations, is 14,430; and all connected with these places of worship, besides supporting their own ministers, are obliged to pay their tithes for the support of the Established Church!

The West Newbury Record is the title of a new Massachusetts paper, just commenced by B. Perley Poore, late of The Boston Bee and Sentinel. Mr. Poore's press is the venerable Ramage, once the property of Franklin, and, solitary and alone, he has composed, imposed, rolled and pulled his edition.

Gov. Ujhazy recently arrived in St. Louis from New Buda to meet Kossuth. We perceive, from newspaper accounts, that the Hungarians have sold their home in Iowa, entitled New Buda, and are now preparing to go toward Texas, or to some salubrious place, there to settle permanently.

A Polish Prince has recently presented to Kontski, the Polish violinist, the large golden goblet which Leopold, Emperor of Germany, gave to John Sobieski for his deliverance of Vienna from the assault of the Turks in 1683. The goblet is a foot in hight, and exquisitely carved and chased.

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June of each year.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress.
Rev. J W. MORTON, } Assistants.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, }

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—

The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term, Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00
Monochromatic Painting	3 00
Oil Painting,	5 00
Writing and Stationery,	0 50
Vocal Music, Elementary,	1 00
Advanced Class,	2 00
Instrumental Music,	8 00

Use of Organ or Piano, $2 00 per quarter.

BOARD, in private families, per week, from $1 25 to $1 50; in clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter Term, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the common school branches, with daily lectures on "The Art of Teaching," Chemistry, Physiology, Laws of Health, School Laws, &c., &c. Tuition $2 50.

Students should not be furnished with unnecessary pocket-money, neither should minors be allowed to contract debts in the village. Either member of the Faculty will superintend the financial affairs of pupils placed under their care, by special direction from parents and guardians, if funds are furnished in advance.

ICEBERGS.

Most people have heard of icebergs, but still know little or nothing about them, except that iceberg means a large body of ice afloat on the sea. Our ships from Liverpool, and other northern ports, frequently report having seen an iceberg or two on the passage; but you ask the reporters any question about them, and it is ten to one if they can say any more than give you the definition of the word. They can neither tell you where nor how they are made or formed, whether on the land or sea, of salt water or fresh. They will probably tell you that they suppose they came either from Hudson's Bay or Davis' Straits, on their way to the South. But of their monstrous dimensions they will say but little; and should you tell them that one has been measured and found to contain more than a million of tons, they will say no more. Little has heretofore been known of them. Of late, however, we have had some additional information from Captain Wilkes, of the South Sea Exploring Squadron, and Captain De Haven, of the late Grinnell Expedition in search of Sir John Franklin, which, with my own observations, I have transcribed for the benefit of those who have no better means of information.

In the early part of my life, I spent three summers at the North, on the coast of Labrador and places adjacent, in latitude from 51 to 54, where the icebergs frequently made their appearance. Seldom a day passed without having a view of some one or more of them, and sometimes ten or a dozen were in sight at a time. I always felt an anxiety to know something of their bulk or dimensions, but could not, as no one had measured them, and navigators differed very much in their opinion as to the proportion of that which was visible above water, and that which was invisible below. Some thought one-tenth above was all; others thought one-third not too much. Thus I jogged on till near the close of the third summer, before I met with any opportunity of gratifying my curiosity. At length a very small one, scarcely entitled to the name of berg, grounded on a rocky bar about four miles from the land. As the tide fell, and I was satisfied that it was fast on terra firma, I went with my lead and line to make a little examination, and found ten fathoms or sixty feet of water; and as I had no instruments to measure the hight, I called it not less than twenty feet, which I now suppose to be about the average proportion between above and below water. On my return, when but a few rods on my way, I heard a tremendous crash, which I at first supposed could be nothing less than the sinking of one of the small islands which lay near the shore by an earthquake; but on looking round, I discovered that my little berg had tumbled all to pieces, and some of the pieces very small. I have no doubt there were more than a thousand of them, and I rather question whether I saw a piece that contained more than 1000 square feet. It was supposed that with the falling tide the weight pressing on the uneven rocky bottom was the cause of the catastrophe. On examining some of the pieces as they floated away, I found them to be transparent, and perfectly free from salt or any mineral, which could not be the case if the bergs were formed on the salt water.

The first formation of those immense bergs, I believe, is still a mystery, especially at the North, as navigators most familiar with them, and who, we would suppose, were the best judges, do not agree. Half a century ago, the most prevailing opinion seemed to be, that they were formed on the north side of high mountains, from small streams that may be seen trickling down the banks, and freezing in the winter, till their weight breaks them loose, and they roll into the sea. This to me looks plausible, for it is no uncommon thing to see banks on the highlands, a thousand feet or more in hight, sloping perhaps from twenty-five to forty-five or fifty degrees, with plenty of the small streams to form ice, and water of sufficient depth below to float them away. And this is similar to the account of the immense glaciers, as they are called, formed in the Alps, which are thus (and no doubt truly) described :—

"At an altitude varying with the latitude of the place, and with local circumstances, the snow is only partly melted, and having therefore imbibed a great quantity of water, it is frozen into a mass of ice during the succeeding winter. A fresh fall of snow covers the frozen spaces, and is in its turn converted into ice. In this way the ice is accumulated during every succeeding winter, till the equilibrium of the mass is destroyed, either by its own weight or by other causes, and the whole is precipitated in the form of an avalanche into the valley below, where, by the change of climate, it is dissolved by the sun and rains, and forms the sources of the principal rivers of the country."

Now, I see no reason why the avalanches that may form on Labrador may not as well tumble into Hudson's Bay or Davis' Straits, and float off in the form of icebergs, and dissolve in the ocean, as to fall into the valley, and form rivers before they reach the sea. The only difference I can see is, I think, that streams of water constantly flowing on the ice would be much more likely to form solid, transparent ice, (like all I have ever seen in the Straits,) than that formed of snow and hail, which, if not perfectly dissolved, must remain very porous and imperfect.

Mr. E. T. DeHaven, commander of the Grinnell Exploring Expedition, has recorded the first measurement of a large iceberg (not the largest) that I have ever met with, though he has not given us his opinion of the first formation. He says :—

"The berth in which our vessels were made fast in this place, was along side of a low tongue of an immense berg, which, by actual measurement, towered up to the hight of 245 feet above the water level. It was aground in 96 fathom water, thus making the whole distance from top to bottom 821 feet. We saw many bergs equally large as this, and some much larger, but this was the only one we had so good an opportunity of measuring with accuracy."

This was a little more than my calculation of one-third above water, when I measured a small one before mentioned, but no certain rule can be given for these proportions, unless for a regularly formed body; for if there is any conical form about it, reason teaches us that it must be above water; and then again much depends on the nature of the ice, whether it is solid or porous, whether formed of water alone, or a composition of water, hail, and snow.

Capt. Charles Wilkes, of the South Sea Exploring Expedition, has been a little more particular in his description; but then we must take into consideration the vast difference in the formation of the two countries before we form our conclusions. At the South there is nothing but sea and ice, neither land, bays, nor harbors, that he could reach. He supposes he discovered land, which he called a continent, followed it fifteen hundred miles, as near as he could get, for the ice, in hopes to find an opening or a harbor. At times he penetrated so far within the ice as to find smooth water and but little tide, and that was a suitable place for the formation of the tabular iceberg. He says :—

"The manner of their formation claimed much of my attention while among them, and I think it may be satisfactorily explained without much difficulty. In the first place, I conceive that the ice requires a nucleus whereon the fogs, snow, and rain, may congeal and accumulate; this the land affords. Accident then separates part of this mass of ice from the land, when it drifts off, and is broken into many pieces; part of this may again join that which is in process of formation. From the accumulation of snow, such a mass speedily assumes a flat or table-topped shape, and continues to increase. As these layers accumulate, the field ice begins to sink, each storm (there of frequent occurrence) tending to give it more weight, and being in deep water continues sinking. It may therefore, I think, be safely asserted, that these icebergs are at all times on the increase; for there are few days, according to our experience, in this climate, in which some mode of precipitation does not prevail in these high latitudes, where, according to our observations, ice seldom melts. The temperature of even the summer months being rarely above the freezing point, masses of a thousand feet in thickness might require but few years to form. When the icebergs are fully formed, they have a tabular and stratified appearance, and are perfectly wall-sided, varying from one hundred and eighty to two hundred and ten feet in hight. Some were found from a quarter of a mile to five miles in length," [not like any thing, I believe, in the North.]

At one time, (2d of Feb.) standing in for the land, he observes :—

"At 3 P. M. when we were within two and a half miles of the icy cliffs by which the land was bounded on all sides, a short distance from us to the westward was a long range of icebergs aground, which, contrary to the usual appearance, looked much weather-beaten. We tried for soundings, but did not get any with one hundred and fifty fathoms, although the water was much discolored. The badness of the deep sea line was a great annoyance to us, for deeper soundings would probably have obtained bottom."

Although Capt. Wilkes said nothing of mountain-formed bergs, yet there is a regular figure of one as could be drawn in one of his plates, with men planting a flag-staff on the top of it as a signal for the squadron; which proves that there are bergs of that description at the South as well as the North, though the land may not be so favorable for their production. The following description of it, by Capt. Wilkes, is interesting; and though I have exceeded the limits of my intention, I will copy it, and close my article :—

"On running in, we passed several icebergs greatly discolored with earth; and finding we could not approach the shore any nearer, I determined to land on the largest ice-island that seemed accessible, to make observations. On coming up with it, about one and a half miles from where the barrier stopped us. I hove the ship to, lowered the boats, and fortunately effected a landing. We found imbedded in it boulders, stones, gravel, sand, and mud or clay. The largest specimens were of red sand-stone and basalt. No signs of stratification were to be seen in it, but it was in places formed of ice conglomerate (if I may use the expression) of large pieces of rocks, as it were, frozen together, and the ice was extremely hard and flint-like. The largest boulder imbedded in it was about five or six feet in diameter, but being situated under the shelf of the iceberg, we were not able to get at it. Many specimens were obtained, and it was amusing to see the eagerness and desire of all hands to possess themselves of a piece of the Antarctic Continent. These pieces were in great demand during the remainder of the cruise. In the center of this berg was found a pond of most delicious water,* over which was a scum of ice about ten inches thick. We obtained from it about five hundred gallons, the quantity in the pond being sufficient for half a dozen ships. We remained upon this berg several hours, and the men amused themselves to their heart's content in sliding. There was no doubt this berg had been detached from the land, which was about eight miles distant. This day, notwithstanding our disappointment in being repelled from treading on the new continent, was spent with much gratification, and gave us many new specimens from it."

From the foregoing we have, I think, a correct view of the enormous size and extent of the icebergs, especially at the South, where there is nothing but land on one side (except attraction) to prevent them from flowing off to the North and dissolving. It appears that Capt. Wilkes was among the ice, and perfectly surrounded by it, more than 40 days, constantly pressing his way westward, without finding a termination, till circumstances compelled him to abandon the pursuit, and return to other duties at the North. J. S.

JERUSALEM—JEWS OF PALESTINE.

From the "Narrative of a Mission of Inquiry to the Jews from the Church of Scotland in 1839." [Continued.

In the cool of the day we enjoyed a delightful ride to the Mount of Olives. Mounted on hardy Syrian horses of very small stature, we rode out at the Jaffa Gate. Here we saw the reapers busy cutting down barley in the valley of Gihon. Turning to the right, we went round the northern wall of the city. The road is rough, and in some parts difficult. Often the bare rock appears, and the way was covered with loose stones. It is made entirely by the feet of the animals that pass along it; and there is not so much as one road about Jerusalem upon which a wheeled carriage could run. Coming to the north-east corner of the walls, the valley of Jehoshaphat opened to our view, and the Mount of Olives across the valley appeared very beautiful, having much more variety of rocks, gardens, olive-yards, fig-trees, and patches of grain upon its sides, than we had expected to find. We now turned due south, riding still under the city wall, which is farther from the brow of the hill than we anticipated. In one point only, named the S. E. corner, does the wall stand on the immediate brink of the valley; in other parts it is forty or fifty yards from the edge. Before reaching St. Stephen's Gate, we came upon a small reservoir half full of water, in which an Arab was bathing. We could not learn its name or history. Near this stands the monument of St. Stephen, where he is said to have been stoned, and the gate called by his name is said to be that out of which they hurried him when "they cast him out of the city." We descended the steep side of Mount Moriah by the foot-path leading from St. Stephen's Gate, and crossed the dry bed of the Kedron by a small bridge. The path here widens out to a considerable breadth for about fifty yards, and then separates into two, the one leading directly up the face of the Mount of Olives, the other winding gently round the southern brow of the hill. Both of these foot-paths lead to Bethany, and between them lies a square plot of ground enclosed with a rough stone wall, and having eight very large old olive-trees. This is believed to be Gethsemane. We stayed only to glance at it, for it needs to be visited in quiet and stillness; and choosing the path that leads straight up the hill, urged our little palfreys up the steep ascent. Mount Olivet was far from being a solitude this evening. One turbaned figure after another met us, and, to add to the interest of the scene, we recognized them by their features to be Jews. At one point we came upon a small company of Jewesses, not veiled like the Moslem ladies, but all dressed in their best attire. The reason of this unwonted stir among the solitudes of Olivet, was that Sir Moses Montefiore, from London, who had come on a visit of love to his brethren in the Holy Land, had arrived at Jerusalem, and his tent was now pitched on one of the eminences of the hill. Multitudes of the Jews went out daily to lay their petitions before him.

We often halted during the ascent, and turned to view the city lying at our feet, the deep valley of Jehoshaphat, and the surrounding hills. By far the finest and most affecting views of Jerusalem are to be obtained from some of these points. In a little after we came to the eminence where Sir Moses Montefiore had pitched his tents. He had fixed a cord round the tents at a little distance, that he might keep himself in quarantine. On the outside of this a crowd of about twenty or thirty Jews were collected, spreading out their petitions before him. Some were getting money for themselves, some for their friends, some for the purposes of religion. It was an interesting scene, and called up to our minds the events of other days, when Israel were not strangers in their own land. Sir Moses and his lady received us with great kindness, and we were served with cake and wine. He conversed freely on the state of the land, the miseries of the Jews, and the fulfillment of prophecy. He said that the Bible was the best guide-book in the Holy Land, and with much feeling remarked, that sitting on this very place, within sight of Mount Moriah, he had read Solomon's prayer over and over again. He told us that he had been at Saphet and Tiberias, and that there were 1500 Jews in the latter town, and more in the former; but they were in a very wretched condition, for first they had been robbed by the Arabs, then they suffered from the earthquake, and now they were plundered by the Druses. When Dr. Keith suggested that they might be employed in making roads through the land, as the materials were abundant, and that it might be the beginning of the fulfillment of the prophecy, "Prepare ye the way of the people; cast up the highway, gather out the stones," Sir Moses acknowledged the benefit that would attend the making of roads, but feared that they would not be permitted. He seemed truly interested in the temporal good of his brethren, and set upon employing their young people in the cultivation of the vine, the olive, and the mulberry. We explained to him the object of our visit to this land, and assured him that the Church of Scotland would rejoice in any amelioration he might effect in the temporal condition of Israel.

* * * * * *

(June 11.) We had agreed to visit the Consul, Mr. Young, this forenoon, to receive information from him regarding the Jews. On going to him, he told us that a remarkable circumstance had occurred that morning. The Turkish Governor of Jerusalem had allowed Sir Moses Montefiore and his attendants to enter the tomb of David upon Mount Zion, and to pray over it, a privilege not granted to a Jew for many centuries. The Governor had called on Sir Moses the day before, and shown him great respect, and that morning had sent him a present of five sheep. The ground of the Governor's respectful treatment of him was the fact of his being a native of Great Britain. Mr. Nicolayson was fortunate enough to be with Sir Moses at the time, and so obtained admittance also, and heard the Jews recite a long form of prayer, and read many of the Psalms, such as the xv., cxxii., cxxvi., over the tomb of the sweet singer of Israel. He described it as a solemn and and affecting scene.

Mr. Young gave the following statistics of the Jews in the Holy Land; and having afterwards taken down Mr. Nicolayson's information on the same subject, we insert both together for the sake of comparison.

	Mr. Young.	Mr. Nicolayson.
Jerusalem,	5000 or 6000	6000 or 7000
Nablous,	150 " 200	200
Hebron,	700 " 800	700 " 800
Tiberias,	600 " 700	1200
Saphet,	1500 " 2000
Kaipha,	150 " 200	150 " 200
Sidon,	250 " 300	300
Tyre,	130 " 150	150
Jaffa,	60	60
Acre,	200	200
Villages of Galilee,	400 " 500	400 " 500

On the whole, Mr. Young reckoned that there are in round numbers about 10,000 Jews in the whole of Palestine. The difficulties, however, in the way of procuring accurate statistics are very great. The Jews are unwilling to give their true numbers, and they are reduced from time to time by the ravages of the plague. Add to this, that few young men come to the land; so that it is not reckoning accurately to take the usual average of individuals in a family. People who come here are generally elderly, and do not leave families behind them to increase the population or supply its vacancies. There is without doubt, a constant influx of Jews into this country, yet not so great as to do more than supply the annual deaths. Their poverty is great. The contributions from Europe of late have been smaller than usual; and when they arrive, instead of doing good, are the occasion of heart-burnings and strife. There is no such thing as "brethren dwelling together in unity" in Jerusalem; no Jews trusts his brother. They are always quarreling, and frequently apply to the Consul to settle their disputes. The expectation of support from the annual European contributions leads many to live in idleness. Hence there are in Jerusalem 500 acknowledged paupers, and 500 more who receive charity in a quiet way. Many are so poor that, if not relieved, they could not stand out the winter season. A few are shop-keepers; a few more are hawkers; and a very few are operatives. None of them are agriculturists—not a single Jew cultivates the soil of his fathers. Among other peculiar causes of poverty, they are obliged to pay more rent than other people for their houses; and their rabbies frequently oppress and overreach those under their care. Whilst Mahomet Ali was in possession of this country, the government had been far more tolerant toward them than before; and on two recent occasions, the Consul had got sentence pronounced in favor of the Jew against the Turk, a new event in the history of this people! Still the common people hate them, and they are exposed to continual wrongs. The soldiers occasionally break into their houses and compel them to lend articles which are never restored.

The professing Christians here—Greeks, Armenians, and Roman Catholics—are even more bitter enemies to Jews than Mahometans; so that in time of danger, a Jew would betake himself to the house of a Turk for refuge, in preference to that of a Christian. How little have these Christians the mind of Christ! Instead of His peculiarly tender love for Israel, they exhibit rooted harted, and thus prove that they are anti-christ. So far do they carry their enmity, that no Jew dare at this day pass by the door of the Holy Sepulchre. On this account, the kindness of Protestants appears to them very striking; and convinces them that there is a real diffrence in the religion we profess. And they are now becoming strongly attached to British Christians. The fact of a British Consul being stationed here on their account, has greatly contributed to this effect. How wonderful that a British Consul should be sent to the Holy Land, with special instructions to interest himself in behalf of the Jews, and having for his district the very region formerly allotted to the twelve tribes of Israel! And how much more wonderful still, that our first Consul in Jerusalem should be one actuated by a deep and enlightened attachment to the cause of God's ancient people! At present, however, the Jews make less use of his influence than they might do; for they say, "If the Consul were to go away, revenge would be taken on us." This is so much their feeling, that when it was lately reported that he was to be removed on account of the war that threatened, many Jews came to him, with tears running down their cheeks, entreating him to remain. There is also another singular fact, namely, that converted Jews have complete access to their brethren. Five converts are here at present, and the Jews treat them with kindness, allow them to visit their houses, and frequently visit them in return. Oh, that the day were come when "the fountain shall be opened to the house of David and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for sin and for uncleanness!" [To be continued.

BYRON'S TRIBUTE TO THE BIBLE.

The following lines were written by Lord Byron on the blank leaf of a Bible a short time before his death. They show that although his life was one of profligacy and impiety, his conscience compelled him to do homage to this wonderful book.

Within this awful volume lies
The mystery of mysteries.
Happiest they of the human race,
To whom their God has given grace,
To read, to hear, to hope, to pray,
To lift the latch—to force the way;
But better had they ne'er been born,
Than read to doubt, or read to scorn.

PERSECUTION IN MADAGASCAR.

The death of the Queen of Madagascar has been announced. Two years ago, says a correspondent of the Independent, this cruel and relentless woman commenced a violent persecution against the Christian people. Deprivation, slavery and death were inflicted on many by her express orders, and the wives and children of those who suffered death for the testimony of Jesus, were condemned to irredeemable slavery. Some time since, the Directors of the London Missionary Society caused a most interesting document —the journal of a native Christian, kept through the persecution—to be in part translated. The following affecting enumeration is from this journal :—

"18 persons put to death, viz., four by burning, and fourteen by being thrown over the rock.

"6 individuals, whose wives and children were made slaves.

"27 preachers condemned to pay half the value of the persons of their wives and children.

"42 persons who brought back their books, and were to forfeit half the value of their persons and property.

"27 preachers, and those that brought their books back from the province of Vonizongo, were to suffer the same punishment.

"1643 persons were adjudged to pay, as an atonement for the sin of worshiping the true God, three bullocks and three dollars each, but of which sum one-half was remitted.

"190 slaves were condemned to be flogged, with twenty stripes each, before the people, and to work in chains during the remainder of their lives.

"2 persons were condemned to pay fines one of one hundred, and the other of fifty dollars; but one-half of the amount was afterward remitted.

"6 persons, who had been punished before, were condemned to work in chains for their lives.

"1 slave, for preaching the word, was condemned to work in chains for his life.

"1 slave, taken by the queen's officers, received a similar sentence :

"Making all together a total number of 1903 persons who have been called to suffer the various punishments above indicated, for the alledged crime of having embraced or favored Christianity."

FARMER JONES AND THE PARSON.

Farmer Jones was one morning standing near the way-side on a small field connected with his farm, which, to the passer-by, had all the appearance of great barrenness, when parson Anderson, coming up on horseback, exchanged salutations with the farmer.

"Busy, I see, with your farming operations, this bright morning," said the parson.

"Not very busy at this moment," said Mr. Jones; "I am bothered to know what to do with this patch of ground, which has never brought me a dollar."

"Yes, I see," replied Mr. Anderson, "it does not look very promising, but the good seed that has been sown there must, I suppose, sooner or later, come up."

"Good seed sown there! Why, no seed has been sown that I know of for five years past, and as it did not come up at the usual time, when it was sown, it would be a strange thing to expect it to appear now. We farmers do not look for crops five years after date," said Mr. Jones laughing.

"Ah, I see," said the parson, "I am rather ignorant about these matters; but I was told that you had a field in which you say good seed was planted ten years ago, and yet the neighbors say you are yet looking for the harvest, although, as yet, there is no appearance of 'blade, ear, or full corn in the ear.'"

"You were told, Mr. Anderson—and pray who told you I was such a fool as all that? When I plant, I expect growth the first season, and if it fails then, I plant again. Who ever heard of good seed growing after it had been lying ten years dead in the ground?"

"Well, I must confess," said Mr. Anderson, "what you say appears reasonable, but as good elder Thomas told me, I thought I would mention it. He might have had some other meaning. If so, perhaps he can find it out. Good morning, sir, I must go on my way."

Farmer Jones stood pondering for a good while, when a thought flashed across his mind, which he found it very difficult to get rid of. The truth was, that ten years before, farmer Jones had professed to be converted and had joined the church. From that time until the time of the above interview, none had been able to see in him the growth of the good seed. He had, indeed, been pretty regular in attending church, although he confessed that sitting still in his pew always made him feel drowsy, so that he did not very well know what the minister was talking about. It was observed, too, that Mr. Jones seldom had any change about him when collections were made for religious purposes, and although very well to do in the world, his contribution for the minister's support was very small. He could never see the good of prayer-meetings and Sunday-schools, and such like things. He considered money spent in subscribing for a, religious newspaper as so much thrown away. If he observed family worship, no one ever found it out; and if he prayed at all, he must have done it very secretly. No one had heard him instructing his sons and daughters, or urging upon them the importance of attending to the concerns of their souls. They were accordingly growing up without the fear of God. Indeed, his was a very irreligious family, not one particle better than if their father had never joined the church. He was, however, a very active man, and could go about any thing in which he was interested with a right good will and a strong hand. He believed the Scriptures, at least so far as this, that he knew "that the hand of the diligent maketh rich," and he was every year becoming richer because he worked for it. He never looked for a crop where he had not sown seed, and he was not the fool to wait ten years for a harvest! While now he stood on his barren patch, the words of parson Anderson worried him, and one thought followed another so quickly and painfully, that he could not avoid the conclusion, that his own irreligious and unproductive life was the thing alluded to by the parson. He did not sleep easy that night. He began to view things in another light, and the result was, as we hear, that good seed was then sown in his heart, which was watered by the dews of heaven, and it sprouted at once, and farmer Jones became a new man, and his family a very different family. PULPITS.

Who knows what becomes of all the old pulpits? What curious tales might be told of some of them; and if they could speak or write, what curious tales could they tell! But, as a matter of curiosity, we should really like to know whether any of the pilgrim pulpits, for instance, are in existence, any where. Let some of the good old brethren rub up their memories, and let us see what is known about these old stand points.

To give an idea of what we mean, here are three or four facts about pulpits in Europe: In a closet near the door of the church of St. Nicholas, at Leipsic, is the pulpit in which Martin Luther, the Reformer, preached.

The pulpit of the celebrated Richard Baxter is still preserved in the vestry of the Unitarian church at Kidderminister, and was occupied by the writer a few years ago. It is small, and of the octagonal form. In the front of it, near the top, are the words, in yellow letters, "Praise ye the Lord;" and on the four front pannels are the words, "Daw widow gave this."

John Bunyan's pulpit was removed many years since from Belfast to London, and it is feared is now lost. His vestry-chair is yet preserved in the vestry of the present church; his pulpit Bible is in possession of the distinguished family of the Whitebreads, who purchased it for a large sum, and his large, awkward pulpit candlesticks are in the pulpit of the Baptist church at Irthlingborough, in Northamptonshire.

The pulpit of the excellent Dr. Isaac Watts was sold a few years ago in London, and is yet used in a small place of worship in that city.

The pulpit used by George Whitefield, in his open efforts on Blackheath, was carefully preserved till a very few years since, when it was borrowed by a careless preacher and broken.

Some twenty years ago, when the Corporation of London purchased the Baptist church in Carter Lane, London, to make the approach to the new London Bridge, they presented the fine old carved pulpit, so long occupied by Dr. John Gill, to his successor, Dr. Rippon. It has been handsomely varnished, and now occupies its proper position in the church in New Park Street, where not a few American Baptist pastors have occupied it. [Watchman and Reflector.

SELAH.

This word occurs frequently in the Psalms, and has puzzled many to know its signification. The following, from the Bibliotheca Sacra, will not be without interest to our readers :—

"The Targums and most of the Jewish commentators gave the word the meaning eternally, forever. Rabbi Kimchi regards it as a sign to elevate the voice. The authors of the Septuagint translation appear to have regarded it as a musical note, equivalent, perhaps, to the word repeat. According to Luther and others, it means silence! Gesenius explains it to mean, 'Let the instrument play and the singers stop.' Wurchur regards it as equivalent to cursum corda—up my soul. Sommer, after examining all the seventy-four passages in which the word occurs, recognizes in every case, 'An actual appeal to the Jehovah. They are calls for aid, and prayers to be heard, expressed either with entire distinctness, or if not in the imperative,' 'Hear Jehovah!' and the like, still earnest addresses to God that He would remember and hear, &c. The word itself he regards as indicating a blast of trumpets by the priests. Selah itself he thinks an abridged expression, used Higgaion. Selah. Higgaion indicating the sound of stringed instruments, and Selah a vigorous blast of trumpets."

"Excellence," says Sir Joshua Reynolds, "is never granted to man but as the reward of labor. It argues, indeed, no small strength of mind to persevere in habits of industry without the pleasure of perceiving these advantages, which, like the hands of a clock, whilst they make steady approaches in their point, yet proceed so slowly as to escape observation."

EASTER.

Many of our readers, who rejoice in the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free, are scarcely aware of the extent to which the Church is in bondage to "days and months and times and years." Leading comparatively secluded lives, and peacefully following their callings, ceasing only on that day which God has constituted holy—the weekly Sabbath—they have but little more than a dreamy consciousness of the fact, that a very large portion of the Christian world is in the habit of holding as many festivals as did Israel of old. The Episcopal Church reckons some thirty, or more, holy days; and while we write, the great one of the catalogue, Easter, from which all the others are reckoned, is scarcely past. The Church of Rome makes the number still larger; and how many more the Greek Church, embracing the population of all Russia in its communion, adds to the catalogue, we cannot now tell.

But the very gala-day of the Church is Easter; and for the information of such of our readers as have not been brought into contact with this festival, and have no leisure to trace out its history, we would state, that it is not a thing of modern origin. At a very early period, the churches were in the practice of holding an annual commemoration corresponding to the Passover of the Jews. How early this practice began, we are not able to say; but there is no evidence that it began in the days of the Apostles, or that it was sanctioned by them. For, notwithstanding the word Easter once occurs in the New Testament, (Acts 12: 4,) it is no credit to the translators of that Book that it is there. It ought to have been translated Passover, as every scholar knows; and the reference is not to any Christian celebration, but to that kept by the Jews. Nevertheless, soon after the Apostles passed from the stage, the practice seems to have begun. At all events, before the close of the second century, the whole ecclesiastical world was engaged in a fierce controversy about the proper manner of observing this festival. The Asiatic churches, with Polycrates, Bishop of Ephesus, at their head, took one side in the controversy, while the church of Rome, led by Victor its Bishop, together with the churches of Cesarea, Jerusalem, Tyre, and Alexandria, took the other side.

The points in dispute were, must the yearly Passover be retained? And if so, must it be begun at the same time that the Jews begin their Passover, and ended in like manner, without regard to the particular day of the week when it begins or closes? The Asiatic churches said Yes, and the Western churches said No. Thus, when the Asiatic party appointed the day after the Passover for the commemoration of the sufferings of Christ, let it fall on what day of the week it might, the other party answered that it must always be on a Friday. Again, when the Asiatic party appointed the third day after the Passover for the commemoration of the Resurrection, let it fall on what day of the week it might, the other party settled that this must take place on a Sunday.

Victor, who was of an ambitious and domineering spirit, claimed the right, as Bishop of Rome, to controll all the churches in this matter. But Polycrates, and the churches with him, resisted his arrogance. In consequence of which, Victor undertook to excommunicate all the churches of Asia Minor, and to give them over to the devil. Synods and convocations of the bishops were held on this question, and all the Western bishops unanimously drew up and sent out a decree, that the mystery of Christ's resurrection should be celebrated on no other day than Sunday; and that on this day alone the paschal feasts should be closed. Still the Asiatic churches held out, till finally, being worn out and terrified by threats, or for the sake of peace, they yielded, and partially adopted the custom of the Western churches.

The controversy, however, does not seem to have been fully settled till the council of Nice, in the fourth century. But after this council, we find Constantine addressing a letter to the churches, urging to uniformity in the day of celebration. After a strong invective against the practice of the Jews, he says, "For we have learned another way from our Saviour, which we may follow. It is indeed most absurd, that they should have occasion of insolent boasting on account of our not being able to observe these things in any manner, unless by the aid of their instructions." "Wherefore, let us have nothing in common with that most odious brood of the Jews." (Socrates, Book I, Chap. 6.)

It will be seen, from this sketch, that what is commonly called Easter Sunday, is the day which closes the annual celebration corresponding to the Passover, and that it is intended to be an anniversary celebration of our Lord's resurrection. The weekly Sunday festival cannot boast of a higher antiquity, nor do we see that its observance rests upon any better foundation. Indeed, the earliest historical testimony to its observance is derived from the writers who lived and wrote during the progress of the controversy to which we have alluded. And such is the nature of their testimony, that it is not very easy to determine whether they speak of the Sunday celebration as being the constant weekly practice of the churches, throughout the year, or whether they simply have reference to the annual observance of it during the Passover festival. Yet this point is absolutely necessary to be settled, before the testimony becomes worth any thing to those who contend for the weekly celebration. We could wish that our modern advocates for Sunday-keeping could be persuaded to investigate this question with more candor. There is no argument for the weekly observance of the first day of the week, which may not be pleaded with equal effect for the observance of the Easter Festival and Good Friday. But, in the absence of inspired authority, what obligation can Christians be under to observe any of these things?

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Sunday Observance—Religious Liberty on the Continent—Popery in England.

GLASGOW, March 26th, 1852.

Our new Prime Minister, "the Earl of Derby, had an audience of her Majesty on Sunday at Buckingham Palace." Such is the announcement. The object of this royal interview is not stated, but we do not suppose that it was to devise means for what our traditionist friends would call "the better observance of the Sabbath." In France, on Sunday last, twelve political prisoners were dispatched from Nancy to Paris, preparatory to their transportation to Africa. And "a review by the President will take place on Sunday next, in the Place du Carousal." Such is a part of the "universal observance" evidence which is adduced for Sunday against the Sabbath of Lord.

More and more does there seem reason to apprehend a general assault on Christian liberty and Scripture truth on the Continent of Europe. It is difficult to conceive how in France there should be tolerated indvidual freedom of thought, at least of speech or action, in matters of highest moment, when it is wholly withdrawn in things of least concern. In Austria, where Popery is rampant, we can also perceive a sufficient motive in an apostate dominant church doing its utmost to suppress whatever is felt to be most condemnatory. It is, however, more painful and more alarming to observe how, in Protestant Prussia, the same course is being followed. This week we learn that the Rev. J. G. Oncken, a Baptist minister, the agent of the Edinburgh Bible Society, has been summarily expelled by the Police from Berlin, while engaged in distributing the Bible, and without any charge being brought against him. The order came "from the highest quarter." Mr. O. had, indeed, preached in a Baptist chapel the day previous, but this also he had done before.

In our own country, Popery is not likely to receive any efficient check at the hands of those now in power, while its audacity increases. A correspondence has lately been published between Lord Campbell and Mr. Murray, a Sheriff, who put a Popish chaplain of his into the carriage with the Judges—a liberty much disrelished by the latter. Another attempt at securing by stealth coveted honor has, however, recoiled on the guilty one in a manner that is likely to be remembered. A Mr. Francis Searle, amanuensis to the Roman Catholic Cardinal Wiseman, was, a few weeks ago, presented at Court, by a Sheriff Swift, as his Chaplain, under a high-sounding title, in gaudy habiliments of beautiful-colored silk. A sad humiliation has followed; for this week the Gazette announces formally, "that the presentation to the Queen, at the levee, on Thursday, the 26th of February last, of the very Rev. Monsignore Searle, is cancelled, that title having been assumed without the required authority."

The close affinity between Popery and the Tractarianism of the Church of England is in many ways made apparent. Mr. Ward, one of the perverts who has been for some years in the city of Rome, has been carrying on a controversy with Dr. Pusey, in which he charges the latter with having taught and countenanced all the peculiarities of Romanism. Pusey replies warily, but certainly in a most unsatisfactory manner—if Protestantism mean anything worth contending for. The Rev. Mr. Bennett, notorious for his Popish histrionics in London, has found a place under the Bishop of Bath and Wells, who received, without professsion of repentance or promise of amendment, the man whom even the Bishop of London had ejected. He is now installed in the living of Frome, in Somerstshire, although both the people of the parish and the clergy of the district remonstrated against the settlement. Again, under the Bishop of Exeter, and with his name published as visitor, there has grown up at Plymouth a miscalled Protestant establishment of "Sisters of Mercy," with a Miss Sellon at their head. The Rev. J. Spurrell has recently published a pamphlet in which, on the statements of one who had been induced to join them, he exposes the arrant Popery that prevails therein, even to the burning of candles by this Mother Superior in her own apartment (or cell) before the Virgin Mary. This pamphlet, the Bishop intimated, Miss Sellon ought to answer—which she has done, in a way that has led to his withdrawing his name, on account of the manifest departure from the original avowed plan, and sound churchmanship, while he praises highly the spirit, and the labors in behalf of the poor, evinced by these females. The self-denial has certainly been great; but we are reminded by it of others spoken of by Christ, who compassed sea and land to make proselytes, to the condemnation of both.

BAPTIST CHURCHES IN HAYTI.—Rev. W. L. Judd, of the Baptist Free Mission Society, says that the statistics of the Baptist churches in Hayti, for the year 1851, were as follows: Port-au-Prince, 5 baptized, 1 added by letter, 2 dismissed, 1 excluded, present No. 48. St. Marc, 6 baptized, present No. 18.

WHAT IS THE LAW OF GOD?

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

I have heard some ministers of the gospel talk a good deal about the "letter of the law" and the "spirit of the law;" that the "letter" may be obeyed by a certain course of conduct, and the "spirit" disobeyed; and that the letter of the law is abolished, while the spirit of the same law is obeyed in another form of service. Now, I frankly confess that I am unable to see this distinction, and think that it is good for nothing.

Let us examine the matter a little, and see what we have in this distinction. First, what part of the law is its "spirit?" and when that is gone, what obligation does the "letter" impose on us? And what is the character of the obligation imposed by the "letter" in the absence of the "spirit?" And what is the character and consequence of obedience or disobedience to one part of the law, and a contrary course towards the other part of the law? The same inquiries may be made in relation to the "spirit" of the law. And if, indeed, there is such a thing as obedience to one part and disobedience to the other, then an action may be partly sin and partly not sin. And suppose God forgive me to-day, and to-morrow I disobey the "spirit of the law," but obey the "letter," and then die without repentance, what will be my doom? I cannot go to heaven. "No unclean thing" will go there. Sinners only go to hell, and I have not a sin against me, for I have only half transgressed a law, and half a sin is not a sin. So it comes to pass, that I am not a candidate for hell. Here I am, then, too sinful for heaven, and too much of a saint for hell; fit for neither the one nor the other. I cannot be miserable, for I am not a sinner. I cannot be happy, for I am not a saint. God will not own me, for saints only are his. The devil cannot, for sinners only are his.

Now, is all this so? No, verily; I do not believe it. This "splitting" the law of God is for the sake of evading the plain precept, in my opinion; if it is not, our friends ought to give a sensible explanation of all this. The other day, I was told by a minister of the gospel, that the letter of the ten commands was abolished, but that the spirit was binding on us. This he did to evade the reading of the fourth command. I asked how he would obey the spirit of the seventh command, and not the letter. The answer he did not give me.

But what, indeed, is the law of God? Is it a sort of compound—some letter, and some spirit, and a part something else? I suppose not. It is God's will concerning our conduct; and words are mere signs of the law. God's will is his law, and words form no part of it: they only describe to us the character of that will or law. I know that some have made a distinction between what is called moral and positive law, supposing that one has its origin in the "fitness of things;" the other in the "arbitrary will" of God. I am of the opinion, that all of God's law to man, designed to govern him as a moral agent, grows out of our necessities for such a law, and is adapted to our constitution. How are we to understand what the spirit of the law is, but by what is called "the letter?"

But once more and I stop. Christ says: "Not one jot or tittle of the law shall fail, till all be fulfilled." With such testimony before us, what room is there for argument? You have the Saviour's word for it. "Not one jot"—not the dot over the i, not the cross on the t, "until all be fulfilled." Do we believe this then? Lord "help our unbelief."

V. HULL.

DEATH OF BISHOP HEDDING.

The death of Rev. Elijah Hedding, Senior Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, took place on Sabbath, April 10, at his residence in Poughkeepsie. Bishop Hedding was in the seventy-second year of his age, having entered the ministry of the Methodist Church fifty-one years ago, and sustained the office of Bishop for twenty-eight years. His last illness was severe and protracted, but he bore it with unshaken fortitude and Christian resignation. He was distinguished for his devotion to duty, the purity and disinterestedness of his character, his extensive attainments, and his wide personal influence in the Methodist Church. An interesting account of his last days is given in The Christian Advocate, the editor of which paid a visit to the venerable Bishop, one week previous to his death. We quote one or two of its paragraphs:—

On Saturday we made a trip to Poughkeepsie, in company with Bishop Janes, for the purpose of a final interview with our beloved and venerable Senior Superintendent Bishop Hedding.

Upon entering the room, he reached out his hand, giving two fingers to Bishop Janes, indicating that the other two were reserved for us. When he had in this manner taken our hands, he said, "I am more glad to see you than I can possibly express. I am full of disease—old diseases and new ones are upon me—and I am prostrated. I am so feeble that I cannot talk much. I would be glad to ask you many questions about the conferences and the preachers, but my strength will not admit." Pausing a little, he then resumed his remarks and, said: "One thing I wish to say now, lest I should not be able to say it at any future time—for I may drop away at any moment—and that is, that God has been wonderfully good to me—his goodness has been overwhelming—overwhelming."

We now took leave until five P. M., when we had the favor of another interview. He was now seated in an easy chair, and consecutively uttered a series of sentences, which seemed almost as weighty as though they had come from the land of spirits. "I have suffered severely," said he; "and although I have no fear of death, I have some dread of pain. The flesh repines; the flesh of the Saviour repined. He said, 'O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me; nevertheless, not my will, but thine be done.' Could I live, I should desire to do so only that I might preach Christ. O to preach Christ! I would rather preach Christ anywhere—on the hardest circuit—than to have the wealth and the honors of the kingdoms of this world.

> 'O for a trumpet voice,
> On all the world to call,
> And bid their hearts rejoice
> In Him who died for all.' "

Here he paused, and for some time gave vent to his feelings in tears. Recovering the power of utterance, he proceeded: "When I think of the dear preachers with whom I have become acquainted all over the length and breath of the land, it seems hard not to be able to visit them again. But the will of the Lord be done; my will is lost in his will—I have no will of my own." After a short pause, he said: "Fifty-two years ago, last December, I gave up my all to God, and I have never taken back the gift. I have been a most fallible creature, and have committed many involuntary offenses, but have never willfully departed from God. I have always needed the atonement of Christ, and have trusted in that alone for the forgiveness of all my shortcomings. I feel that I can sing with Mr. Wesley,

> 'I the chief of sinners am,
> But Jesus died for me.'

"I used to wonder how it could be that Christ could have mercy upon such a poor miserable sinnner as I am, and save me. There was a kind of mist over the subject; but within a few days all this mist has been cleared away. I now see such goodness, such glory, such power—such power"—repeating the word with great emphasis—"in the Redeemer, that there is now no difficulty in it!" We remarked, "Your spiritual vision is now clear." "Yes," responded he, "it is all plain now." During the conversation he remarked:—"Since this dreadful disease struck me, more than a year ago, I have not had one really dark hour, or one pang of guilt."

We retired from the room with the strongest feelings of admiration of the humility, the deep and unaffected piety, and the gigantic intellectual strength of our venerable Senior Bishop. We have known and admired his real greatness from the period of our first acquaintance with him. But if he was great in the field of action, he is still greater in the hour of suffering, and in the prospect of death.

JOURNALISM.

Armand Marrast, one of the most distinguished journalists of France, died recently. No speeches were allowed over his grave; but Lamartine, who was one of the mourners, and was associated with Marrast in the Provisional Government, paid the last homage to his colleague in a brief but glowing eulogy, published in the Presse. The Tribune translates from the article what Lamartine says of journalism. The passages have especial interest, coming from a man who is one of the most eminent orators and brilliant journalists of the day:—

"Journalism is the hot-house of glory. It ripens it in a few days, and consumes it as rapidly. The Journal has the inconveniences of the tribune. It makes a loud noise, but it is brief as day, and the night swallows it up. With rare exceptions, there remains of the Journalist, as of the Orator, only a name, but no works. It is sad, but it is just. Their own time has no ears for them, because they address its passions, its opinions, and its fugitive interests. The future forgets them, because they did not regard it enough. How should they have the leisure to think of it? They are the gods of the moment. Squandering their destiny, they enjoy vividly, but briefly. They expend every thing in small change; they are not wise enough to lay up a treasure to be found in their tombs.

"Journalism has another disadvantage. It deals with persons, it wounds mortally, it strikes at opinions. It constantly requires points, to keep public attention excited. It seeks these points in exaggerated rage—in furious apostrophe—in bitter sarcasm. This is the price it pays to make its foes weep and bleed—and its friends smile and applaud. Ah! unhappy temptation of the witty Journalist! Pen in hand, he lets it run—an odious or ridiculous portrait of some feature is drawn—a name is wounded—a man is dead. To-morrow the Journalist repents—it is too late. He stifles the cry of remorse, that he may hear only the voice of self-love. He constantly redoubles his efforts—he is never sure that he has struck hard enough, unless his foe groans or cries under the lash. He is kind, but he seems cruel. He wished to laugh, and he has slain! Aristophanes did so in Athens. Marrast, by nature, was superior to Aristophanes. His irony—offspring of his talent, and not of his heart—was but the sparkle of his spirit. His railleries were professional, his repentance was of his heart. I have been sometimes their object, but I harbored no rancor. His goodness always punished the overflow of his sprightliness."

PETITION OF THE INDIANS.

The Indians of the Onondaga Nation have set a good example for their pale-faced brethren in the following petition. Read their simple tale of what the "great rogue" Alcohol has done among them, and then lend them a helping hand by seconding their petition.

To the Senate and House of Representatives, Albany:

DEAR FATHERS AND BROTHERS,—We understand you are at the great Council House at Albany, and that the great Council Fire is now burning, and that our White Brothers all over the State are sending wood to put on the Council Fire, but we 'fraid the Council Fire will not burn bright and clear without more help, so we send this to make it burn. Now, Brothers, what we want to say is this: We hear about our Brothers in the State of Maine—we hear that they find GREAT ROGUE; this Rogue, he gets folks' money; sometime he burn houses; sometime he kill people; sometime he make a family very poor; sometime he take 'way senses; sometime he make 'em very cross, and ragged, and dirty; and sometime he freeze 'em to death.

Now, we hear our Brothers there—they try to stop it—they try talk about it, see if can stop it little—but he won't stop. We hear at last our Brothers won't bear it no longer—so they make law to knock him on head, any where they find him—in barrel, or jug, or bottle, in tavern, grocery, or barn, any where, knock him on head.

Now we want to tell you, Brothers, that this big Rogue has been here to Onondaga; he has made us great trouble. Some of our people would be very good if this bad fellow would keep away. We try—our people try some too, but he will not. Now what we ask you is to make laws—such as our Brothers in the State of Maine have made. We have tried coax him, but he won't be coaxed; we try scare—he won't scare much; he still make great deal trouble; we think better make law to knock him on head—then he make us no more trouble. We Christian party ask it, and some Pagan, too—most all ask it—you make this law.

Now, Brothers—our people sold our land to white people, and white people make treaty—he say he be good to Indian. But he let this Rogue trouble us most too long. Now, Brothers, we was once great people, and we have gone to war for our white brothers; but now we are few, and our white brothers are strong. We want you help us—we want you make this law, so when we find this Rogue we will kill him. We see him great many times, but we mean to be good and peaceable, and so he get away; but if you make this law, then we will kill him, and then we live happy and friendly—no more cross—no more ragged—no more fight, but raise corn, wheat, oats, beans, cattle, horses, and some children too; no more get drunk—no more freeze to death—work and get good things like white men.

REVIVALS IN NEW YORK.—Revivals are reported from several places in N. Y. State, among them Chittenango, Sardinia, Middlesex, Castile, and Ira. The Baptist Register thus refers to the intelligence which it is receiving from eastern portions of the State:

There seems to be an evident spreading of the gracious cloud, and the signs indicate an abundance of rain. We were informed yesterday, by Bro. Harris, of Amsterdam, of a powerful work in that place, chiefly, however, among the Methodists. Some 220 or 230 are supposed to be converted. In Schenectady the work is also very powerful. Bro. Day, of the Baptist church, is enjoying a precious season among his people; and in the Dutch Reformed and Methodist churches, the manifestations of the Spirit are very extraordinary; over all that region the evidences of the Divine power are striking and impressive. In Albany the revival still progresses; quite a number were baptized by Bro. Jefferey last Lord's day. In various other places the Lord has made bare his arm, furnishing abundant encouragement to other churches to arise from their lethargy, and press their suit for a share in the gracious visitation while the Dispenser of mercy is thus shedding down his favors on those who are earnestly imploring them.

EMBARKATION OF MISSIONARIES.—The Boston Journal of March 24, says that Rev. Isaac N. Hurd and his wife embarked on board the ship Loo-Choo, that morning, for the mission station of the American Board in Arcot, in Hindostan—about 70 miles from Madras.

Since October last, the American Board have sent out over forty missionaries, male and female. These laborers have gone to some twelve or fifteen different stations, which almost encircle the globe. There are two more now ready to sail for one of the missions among the Nestorians. They will leave in the course of a few weeks. The Board have others under appointment, who will be sent forward as soon as practicable. One or two, we believe, are destined for China.

PROVIDENTIAL CARE OF MISSIONARIES.—The American Messenger says that the number of missionaries sent out by the American Board of Commissioners, including ordained missionaries, physicians, other male assistants, and females, is 852; none of whom, so far as known, have lost their lives or been seriously injured in their journeying to and from their fields of labor by land and water. Three, Messrs. Munson and Lyman, in Sumatra, and Dr. Satterlee, West of the Pawnee country, lost their lives by savage violence, while on exploring tours; and Rev. Mr. Benham, of the Siam mission, was drowned while crossing a river near his house.

REMARKABLE COINCIDENCE.—Mr. Wingate, the Scotch missionary that was expelled from Pesth by the Austrian Government, on the last Sunday before his expulsion, preached upon the parable of the ten virgins; dwelling especially on the words—"The door was shut." The next day, when the people heard of the edict of expulsion, they came to ask him if he knew of it when he preached—supposing of course that he had preached with special reference to it—though in fact he knew nothing of it. Yet at the very time of his preaching, the government messengers were at his house for the purpose of communicating the order of expulsion.

LARGE BEQUESTS.—Hans Wilson, a wealthy citizen of Steubenville, Ohio, died recently in that city, in the 86th year of his age, leaving in bequests $50,000 to the Board of Domestic Missions of the Presbyterian Church; $50,000 to the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church; $1,000 to the Presbyterian Church of Steubenville, and $200 each to all the other Churches in that city; $1,700 to the Presbyterian Bible and Tract Societies of Steubenville, and $500 to the poor of the city. Mr. W. was a native of Ireland, and began life in Steubenville very poor.

CHURCH-BUILDING.—The Buffalo Christian Advocate states that Aristarchus Champion, Esq., of the city of Rochester, a gentleman of great wealth and equal benevolence, has pledged himself to Dr. Luckey, "to give ten thousand dollars to build ten new Methodist Churches, five on each side of the river, provided that at each point designated, they raise a thousand dollars more. The doctor is said to be busy with the other brethren in selecting sites, and the probability is that several of them will go up at once." This generous contribution is the more commendable, from the fact that the liberal donor is not himself a Methodist, but a member of the Presbyterian Church.

A ROMISH MOVEMENT.—A bill has been brought forward in the Legislature of New York, to vest in Archbishop Hughes and the other Roman Catholic Bishops of the State of New York, and their successors, all the rights and titles of the property which may belong to the Roman Catholic Church in their Dioceses. Should this bill become a law, it will give the Archbishop the control of every Roman Catholic church-edifice, and all other property, which may belong to any Roman Catholic congregation in the entire State. It would enable him not only to oppress the churches and congregations of his own flock, but to wield a power dangerous to our potitical institutions, and foreign to our republican ideas and feelings. The proposition meets with great opposition from even Roman Catholics.

TOO POOR TO HAVE THE BRONCHITIS.—One of the Baptist papers recently stated that Rev. R. R. Raymond, of Syracuse, would be unable to preach for some time on account of a deeply-seated throat disease. In reply, Mr. Raymond writes:—

"Allow me to say, I have no bronchitis, never had any bronchitis, and as I am not rich enough to go to Europe, do not mean to have any bronchitis at present."

BIBLES IN GEORGIA.—The Savannah Bible Committee have employed five colporteurs in exploring fifteen counties of the State the past year. They report that "in some cases one third, and even one half of the families visited were entirely destitute of the Bible." In one family, where the wife had been a member of the church for 14 years, they had never had any portion of the word of God in the house.

ROOMS FOR BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES.—The Baptist papers are agitating the question of securing a building in New York for the use of the American and Foreign Bible Society, and perhaps the Baptist Home Mission Society. The N. Y. Recorder suggests the idea of a joint stock company, for the purpose of purchasing a building so arranged that rooms could be furnished free of cost, forever, to the Bible Society, and leave besides enough of the building to rent for various purposes, to meet the taxes, insurance, etc., and pay a fair interest on the shares of the stock.

THE GORHAM CASE.—The costs of both parties in this case would have been sufficient to build and endow twenty churches of the size of Brampford Speke. Sir Fitzroy Kelly, M. P., alone, has had three separate retainers of 500 guineas each, besides consultation fees, which will bring up his share to nearly £2000. It is stated in legal circles, that the whole costs are upwards of £80,000.

NEW YORK LEGISLATURE.—The pay of the N. Y. Legislature stops on Fourth-day, April 14, and of course an adjournment will soon follow. Nothing is likely to be done for temperance. The Law which has been under discussion for some time past—essentially the Maine Liquor Law—was voted on last Sixth-day, and defeated, there being sixty-nine noes to forty-five ayes.

THE SABBATH-SCHOOL VISITOR.—We are sorry to find that several of the churches do not take their quota of the Sabbath-School Visitor this year. In no instance, so far as we know, is fault found with the character or price of the paper; on the contrary, satisfaction in this respect is generally expressed. But the difficulty seems to be to find persons who will take the trouble of getting up lists of subscribers, paying postage, distributing the papers, &c. Would it not be well for the churches, in which no one volunteers for this service, to appoint, and if necessary pay, some one to do it? There is no way in which they can more effectually or cheaply originate and keep alive Sabbath-Schools.

While upon this subject, we may as well say, that the first three numbers for this year were sent to a good many persons from whom no returns had been received. The April number, however, was sent only to those who had intimated a desire for its continuance. There are on hand copies of all the back numbers for those who wish complete sets.

THE CHRISTIAN REVIEW for April presents the following table of contents, which speaks for itself:—

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, APRIL 5.

In the SENATE, a protest against Government aid to Steamship Companies was presented. Two or three unimportant resolutions were then introduced. The remainder of the day was spent in discussing the new apportionment under the Census of 1850, the contest being whether South Carolina or California or each should have an additional Member of Congress.

The HOUSE spent the whole day in discussing a resolution recognizing the binding efficacy of the compromises of the Constitution.

THIRD-DAY, APRIL 6.

In the SENATE, Mr Douglass presented the petition of Henry O'Rielly, proposing to establish a line of communication by Mail and Telegraph from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean. He asked no money or land, no donations or gifts; but that his line of Telegraph may be protected by the military posts of the Government. As military posts have been authorized in that territory, he asked that, instead of being place in large bodies, they may be put in stations of twenty men, at distances of twenty miles apart. Thus the telegraph, the mails, and emigrants also, could be protected by the same line of military posts. If this be done, Mr. O'Rielly thinks he can, in two years from this time, have European news published on the Pacific in one week from the time of its leaving Europe.

The Chair laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, in response to a resolution calling for his opinion and estimates, with respect to reconnoisance of the Chinese seas, &c. The Secretary thinks such reconnoisance would be eminently serviceable, and that it could be performed by United States vessels at a very little increase of expenditures. Also, a communication from the Secretary of War, in reply to a resolution concerning depots, &c., for gunpowder. The Secretary recommends the establishment of more depots for the storage of gunpowder, and gives the quantity now stored at the various arsenals, from which it appears there are at Watervliet, near Troy, 249,405 pounds.

The Non-Intervention resolutions were then taken up, and their discussion occupied the remainder of the day.

In the HOUSE, the Naval Discipline and Homestead bills were discussed, but no conclusion come to on either.

FOURTH-DAY, APRIL 7.

In the SENATE, after some unimportant business, in which the French Spoliation bill and others were urged for precedence, the Apportionment bill was taken up and discussed, but no conclusion arrived at. Mr. Hunter reported the Deficiency bill from the House, with amendments, increasing the appropriations by about a million of dollars.

In the HOUSE, several Railroad and other Land Grants were discussed without any definite action. The Homestead bill was taken up, and upon it Mr. Ward of Kentucky made a strong speech in favor of Gen. Scott.

FIFTH-DAY, APRIL 8.

In the SENATE, after disposing of several petitions, the Japan Expedition was discussed and postponed. The Apportionment bill was then taken up, and Mr. Bradbury's amendment, allowing two members to California and one for the fraction in South Carolina (thereby increasing the number of members of the House of Representatives to 234) was carried.

In the HOUSE, the Navy Discipline bill was taken up, and postponed to take up the Homestead bill. Several Buncombe and humorous speeches were made, and then the House adjourned.

SIXTH-DAY, APRIL 9.

The SENATE spent nearly the whole day in a discussion upon the Capitol Enlargement Bill. The result was concurrence in the House amendment, increasing the appropriation to $500,000. Adjourned to Second-day.

The HOUSE was occupied most of the day, in Committee on the private calendar, on a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Gen. James C. Watson, late of Georgia. The bill appropriates $4,600, with interest from 1838; being the amount paid by Watson, under the sanction of the Creek warriors, for slaves captured by said warriors, while they were in the service of the United States against the Seminole Indians in Florida. The Bill was passed by a vote of 79 to 53, and the House adjourned to Second-day.

A Steamboat Explosion.

The Cincinnati Gazette gives the following particulars relative to the explosion of the steamer Redstone, on Sabbath afternoon, the 3d inst.:—

Three boilers exploded at the same instant. All the upper work of the boat forward of the ladies' cabin was blown to atoms—the hull swung round with the current, and immediately sunk at the bow, in 20 feet water, while the stern rested on the bottom near the shore. There were on board at the time about sixty-five passengers, of whom it is thought thirty-five must have been killed.

Among the killed are Rev. Mr. Scott, Mr. Coble, editor of the Lawrenceburg Press, and Mr. Myers, foreman in the same office. The first and second engineers and all the firemen were killed instantly.

The awful force of the explosion can be conceived from the fact that a large piece of one of the boilers was thrown half a mile, lacking 5 or 6 yards, from the wreck! Eleven bodies were blown into a cornfield at some distance from the water. Among them, those of the first and second engineers.

The people of Carrolton and the vicinity hurried to the scene, and 25 dead and wounded bodies were immediately borne to a small farm-house on top of the hill which rises back from the river, and which was converted into a hospital. The inmates of this house gave up their rooms, bedding, and everything in their possession, to the suffering. The scene here beggars all description. The mangled and ghastly corpses by the side of the wounded and dying, with inadequate medical aid and means for the care of the latter—the floors of the rooms covered deep with blood; this, and the view of the scattered wreck and the awe-stricken multitude on the shore below, made up a scene of horror before which the intensest paintings of Sue and Dickens pale and grow dim.

The river for some distance below Carrolton was strewn with the fragments of the boat, furniture and clothing. Small pieces of bedding and clothing were found at the distance of very nearly half a mile back from the river, while the trees along the shore were littered with the fragments of the same, and of the wreck!

New York State University.

The establishment of a New York State University of Albany is strongly urged in influential quarters. The cardinal features of the plan are set forth by its friends as follows:—

First: The collection and organization in one institution of so large a body of Professors of preëminent ability as shall fully embrace every department and subdivision of Learning, including Science, not only in all its most elevated aims, but in its practical and daily application to agriculture and all the arts of life.

Second: The free choice allowed to the scholars to pursue any particular branches or departments they may select, and to any extent they may desire, so as to perfect themselves thoroughly for the highest degree of actual usefulness. This, in truth, is the distinguishing feature of this plan—a great but necessary step, and one not at all in opposition to our existing colleges.

Third: The immediate collection of 120 pupils of the most desirable character, being taken one from each of the Assembly Districts of the State, and to be supported for two years at the public charge—constituting a most valuable nucleus around which other paying pupils would gather.

Fourth: The fair, open, public, and truly democratic mode of competition, by which the selection of those pupils in the State is to be determined—by examiners locally chosen in each district, and in such mode as to be free from political bias or favoritism.

Fifth: The fixing such a standard for examination as shall enable the pupils of our Common Schools to qualify themselves for admission; and the consequent and inevitable effect in stimulating a general appetite for learning throughout the State, and elevating the tone of the Common Schools themselves.

European News.

Two steamers, with Liverpool dates to March 27th, have arrived since our last. The following summary embraces all the news of general interest.

In the House of Commons, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that it was not the intention of Government in the present Parliament to introduce any bill for the repeal of the Maynooth grant.

The screw steamer Great Britain, Capt. Matthews, has made a trial trip which was entirely satisfactory. The first outward trip of the Great Britain is fixed for the 1st of May, by which time accommodation will be made for the reception of 400 first and a large number of second class passengers.

The London Times states that public opinion in England will favor the American Japan expedition.

The Committee upon the final disposition of the Crystal Palace have reported to this effect, that if it be retained where it is, its best use would be as an ornamental garden. If it is decided not to retain it in Hyde Park, the Committee cannot recommend its erection elsewhere at the public expense. They add, that if the expenditure of £80,000 were not an insuperable objection, the principal portion of the building might be removed to Kew as a Conservatory. In such case, it is their opinion that the whole building should be purchased, and those parts sold which were not needed. The Daily News says that a Committee of Noblemen and Gentlemen will be formed to test public opinion as to the final disposition of the palace. The Government and Royal Commission had decided, before the presentation of the report, to let the contract take its course, which will result in taking down the building.

The Glasnevin Cemetery Committee, in Ireland, have made an offer of appropriating £500 for a monument over Thomas Moore, the poet, in the event of his remains being transferred from England. A pension of £300 a year reverts to the Civil List by the death of the bard of Ireland. He kept a journal with singular regularity during many years of his life—extending, indeed, from a very early period up to the commencement of his fatal illness. It occupies three volumes of closely written MS., and was always intended by the poet for publication. It will be prepared for the press by Mrs. Moore.

John Sealy Townsend, a retired Master in Chancery, and one of the distinguished ornaments of the Irish bar in the days of its greatest brillancy, died at his residence, Kilvara, near Dublin, at the advanced age of 87. He was the contemporary and competitor of Plunkett, Curran, Saurin, Bushe, Pennefather, &c.

The Patrie states that several ex-representatives who quitted France voluntarily after the coup d'etat have just returned. It adds, that three ex-representatives of the Mountain have applied for letters of naturalization in the United States.

The Paris Moniteur contains a decree imposing severe restrictions upon the sale of materials for printing. Entries are to be made of the names and addresses of purchasers, and copies of this register sent to the Prefect of Police. No private press, however small, can be possessed without authorization. Printers' licenses are in future to be conferred by the Minister of Police.

Jonas King, D. D., Consul of the United States at Athens, has been tried and condemned to imprisonment and expulsion from the country upon a charge of reviling the Greek Church while preaching in his own house. The gendarmes were obliged to defend him on his return to his own house after the trial, so great was the exasperation of the people against him.

At a recent floral ball in Dresden, the skillful gardeners of that city distributed among the ladies fans made of flowers, and so delicately wrought that they could be opened and used like other fans.

The order of Jesuits in Austria numbers 139, of which 70 are Priests; 31 of these are Missionaries, and 28 of the latter serve in Africa.

The loss of the Austrian steam corvette Marianne, in the Adriatic, is confirmed beyond doubt. Eighty persons, among whom was Baron Kubeck's son, perished in her.

Six hundred and fifty emigrants from Altenburg (formerly one of the most fertile and rich provinces in Germany) arrived at Madgeburg, in order to proceed to Bremen, where they will be embarked to the United States. Their leader, an old man, fell sick at the Railroad station, and died half an hour afterward. His companions were forced to leave the corpse of their friend, whom they stated to have died of a broken heart at the necessity of emigrating. They departed with tears in their eyes, entrusting the body of the old man to the Madgeburg authorities, who are to bury him in his native soil.

The Imperial Government of Russia proposes an Industrial Exhibition in alternate years, at Petersburg, Moscow and Warsaw.

THE LIQUOR LAW IN MAINE.—Neal Dow, the author of the Maine Liquor Law, and Mayor of Portland, was defeated at the recent election. This result has been used as an argument against the Maine Law. But a Portland paper—the Eastern Argus—speaks differently of the matter. It says:

"Judge Parris' administration will vindicate itself. He will prove himself, we believe, a faithful, capable, and judicious officer. He will execute the laws—the Liquor Law and all—in the true spirit of the laws, and he will do so, we trust, in such a way that his official action will not be overruled by the Courts of Justice of the State. The voters of Portland have not believed that the laws could not be executed here without the re-election of Mayor Dow. They have thought, on the contrary, that Judge Parris would do better justice to the duties of that office than its present occupant. It is not, of course, a result against temperance, for Judge Parris is a staunch temperance man. It is not a result in favor of repealing the Liquor Law, for no such issue was presented in the canvass."

FEARFUL STEAMBOAT EXPLOSION!—The Buffalo Republic has some additional particulars of the explosion of the steamer Glencoe, at St. Louis. It says:—

"A later dispatch informs us that not less than 150 lives have been lost by this awful calamity. The scene is described as heartrending in the extreme. When the explosion took place, the boat was completely rent asunder, and human bodies, mangled and whole, and pieces of the wreck, flew up a great hight into the air. Numbers were seen struggling in the water for a few instants, whose wounds were such that they soon sunk to rise no more. The passengers and crews on the other boats at the landing crowded to the sides of their vessels in order to see the arrival of the ill-fated Glencoe. Many of them were killed, and a great number terribly injured. The shrieks and wailings of the wounded—the red glare of the fire, and the consternation of the surrounding crowd, beggar description. It was an awful scene."

RAILROAD ACCIDENTS.—The following extract from the last report of H. C. Seymour, Esq., State Engineer and Surveyor for the year ending 30th September, 1851, shows how much danger there is from being out of one's place in railroading, and how safe they are who keep where they ought to:—

"The small amount of danger attending Railway travel is strongly exhibited in the fact, that of passengers who were in the cars and in their seats, as they should have been, not one has been killed, and only seven or eight slightly bruised, during the past year, of the vast numbers who traveled upon the roads referred to."

MAZZINI'S ESTIMATE OF THE POPE.—At a meeting of the friends of Italy, which recently took place in London, M. Mazzini was the chief orator. He said that the Papacy was the curse of his country. The moment the Pope was limited to his forces, and deprived of the aid of Austrian and French troops, he would run away from Rome, and thus the question would be solved. They aimed, candidly speaking, at the destruction of the Papacy, both as a temporal and spiritual power. When the Pope had run away, they would adopt measures to ascertain the actual state of belief in Italy, and the meeting might depend upon it, the verdict would be that the Papacy was a curse.

SUMMARY.

The late Mrs. Ware, of Frankfort Ky., by her will emancipated all her slaves—thirty in number—and purchased for them thirteen hundred acres of good land in Ohio, lying on the Miami Canal. Twenty-seven of these disenthralled human beings recently arrived in Cincinnati from Frankfort, in charge of the executor of the estate of their late mistress, and were purchasing wagons, agricultural implements and stores for their new home.

A mine of Spanish Whiting has recently been discovered on the farm of Mr. Williams, in the south-western part of Alto, Fond du Lac Co., Wisconsin, which is said to embrace an area of near 20 acres. The whiting is within eighteen inches of the surface, and is comprised in a layer of from 18 inches to 2½ feet in thickness. It has been pronounced by competent judges to be a superior article.

In the United States Court, Captain Henry C. Pittman, late of the ship Sterling, was convicted of plundering the bark Missouri, of New York, (wrecked on the coast of Sumatra) of 16,000 silver dollars. The Captain of the Missouri, (Dixey,) had previously pleaded guilty; he stated that the wreck was accidental, but he afterwards proposed the robbery to Captain Pittman, and he assented to it.

The Hudson River Railroad, in order to meet the wants of the traveling public to the fullest extent, proposes shortly to run about seven daily trains from New York to Albany, and in most of them to make such reduced rates of fare as will effectually compete with the prices charged on the steamboats.

There is now pending in one of our Courts a suit brought by the City against a ship-owner for the sum of sixty-eight cents, and upon this very suit, in the equity of which not the first move has been made, there has been about three hundred dollars charged as costs!

The Rev. Isaac N. Hurd and wife sailed from Boston, a short time ago, in the ship Loo-Choo, for the mission station of the American Board at Arcot, about seventy miles from Madras.

A law has passed both Houses of the Louisiana Legislature, which gives the exclusive power to police Judges and to the Mayors and Aldermen of cities to make such laws and regulations for the sale of intoxicating liquors as they may deem advisable, and to grant or withhold licenses from drinking houses or shops, as a majority of the citizens and voters of any ward, parish, town and city, may determine by ballot. This act takes effect from the date of its passage.

A liquor bill of even more stringency than the Maine law has passed both the Houses of Assembly and Legislative Council of New Brunswick, and is now only waiting the sanction of the Governor, which it is understood will be given to it. The law is not to go into effect untill June 1853, in order to allow those who have capital invested in the traffic to get rid of their stocks without pecuniary loss.

As the steamer Camanche was ascending the Rio Grande, with forty passengers on board, including many ladies, and also Gen. Caravajal, she was fired into from the bank by some Mexican soldiers. Several shots struck the boat, but luckily no lives were lost. The shots were probably intended for Caravajal. The outrage has excited much indignation among Americans.

The Chicago Democrat says that on and after April 6, the cars will leave that city at 7 o'clock A. M. for Toledo, where passengers can take a boat and be in Dunkirk for breakfast the next morning, and in time to take the morning train for New York City. It is now rendered certain, that the time between Chicago and New York can be reduced to forty hours.

In Boston, a few days ago, a young girl, eighteen years of age, a grand-daughter of a New Zealand king, was arrested and tried for larceny in the Municipal Court. Her fine of $50 was paid by subscription, and the heir of royalty was sent to school to learn better manners.

Edmund Glore, convicted of the murder of Thomas Carpenter last fall, was executed at Madison Court House, Va., on the 26th ult. It is stated that between three and four thousand persons were present to witness the execution. He made a full confession, and attributed his end to intemperance.

Aristarchus Champion, Esq. of Rochester, has given $10,000 to the M. E. Church in that city, for erecting ten churches, to be worth, when completed, two thousand dollars each. Five of these churches are to be erected on the east, and five on the west side of the river, and are to be completed as soon as practicable.

Judge Thompson, of the Court of Common Pleas in Pennsylvania, has decided that the tenant of a farm in that State cannot remove or sell the manure from the farm, no matter how produced. This has been long a vexed question, and the Judge's opinion is of interest to farmers generally.

A circular from the Secretary of the Treasury, says: Newspapers, properly so called, will hereafter be exempt from duty, when imported from Europe for immediate distribution to subsbribers. Duty will still be imposed on periodicals, in book and pamphlet form.

The Grand Jury at Boston were investigating the case of Brewer, charged with embezzling the funds of the Suffolk Bank, on Wednesday. There were rumors in the street that day that further defalcations have been discovered, and that the deficit will reach $100,000.

The London Times says it has taken some pains to ascertain the number of persons arrested in France within the last few weeks, and it is assured, by the best authorities, speaking on sufficient evidence, that the number probably reaches 100,000.

It is stated that the Railroad from Dunkirk to Erie will be in running order in September next, and The Cleveland Herald says that the track from Cleveland to the Pennsylvania line will be in operation during the present year.

The Queen of Spain, in return for the blessed linen presented by the Pope to her august daughter, intends to send to His Holiness a picture by Murillo and a span of Aranjuez horses.

Samuel Todd, aged 101 years and 14 days, died in Middletown, Delaware Co., on the 19th ult. He was one of the few Revolutionary Fathers left, and probably one of the oldest among them.

A resolution has passed the popular branches of the Ohio Legislature, by a nearly unanimous vote, instructing the Ohio delegation in Congress to advocate and vote for the freedom of the public lands.

At the last anniversary of the London Missionary Society, it was stated that one-fifth of the Society's income for the past year had been contributed by converts from heathenism.

The Common Council of Washington City have adopted a resolution, asking of Congress the passage of more effective laws for the suppression of gambling, or the granting of such power to the city authorities.

MARRIED,

In Edmeston, Otsego Co., N. Y., on the 6th inst., by Eld. W. B. Maxson, Mr. SIMEON FURBUSH, of New Berlin, to Miss HANNAH BURDICK, of Edmeston.

DIED,

In DeRuyter, N. Y., March 28th, MATTHEW WELLS, senior, in the 87th year of his age. Brother Wells early made a profession of faith in Christ, the sincerity of which he has evinced by an unvarying attachment to the cause for three-fourths of a century. He was one of the first settlers in DeRuyter, and had not ceased during life to interest himself in the public welfare, and especially in the welfare of the church of his choice. Though he was never forward in the improvement of public gifts, his hand was ever open to advance the interests of Zion. His zeal in this way was evinced to the last, and in his last testament he left $100 for the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society. He delighted much in the study of the Bible, and he was emphatically a man of prayer, particularly secret prayer, and his devotions at the family altar are said to have been peculiarly fervent.

On the 2d of April, of consumption, JULIA LANGWORTHY, daughter of the late Saunders Langworthy, of Brookfield, aged 40 years. During the last twenty years she has been a growing Christian, and a worthy member of the second Seventh-day Baptist Church of Brookfield.

At the residence of her son, while on a visit, in Nunda, Livingston Co., N. Y., January 29, 1852, Mrs. RELIANCE BLISS, wife of the much-esteemed Rev. John Bliss, in the 89th year of her age. Mrs. Bliss was born in New Bedford, Mass. At an early day she united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Stephentown, N. Y. She spent about fifty years of her life in Greenfield, Saratoga Co., N. Y. The latter part of her life was spent in Portageville, N. Y. It is about fifty years since she professed a hope in Christ. Her removal to Portageville deprived her of the privilege of church relationship, but did not remove her from the presence of her Saviour, upon whom she placed her hopes of heaven, and into whose arms she quietly fell asleep, without a struggle, with no apparent disease, but merely ceased to breathe as a result of old age.

In Charlestown, R. I., March 9th, 1852, Mrs. ALICE HEALEY, consort of Mr. John H. Healey, deceased, in the 83d year of her age. She was a pious Christian, and such she died. She was born, always resided, and died, in the same house.

In South Kingstown, R. I., March 30th, 1852, CATHARINE AUGUSTA, daughter of Dea. Clarke Crandall, aged 8 months and 8 days.

In Leonardsville, on the 3d inst., EMMA R., daughter of Wm. H. and Sarah Ann Brand, aged 5 years and 2 months.

God took thee in his mercy,
A lamb, untasked, untried;
He fought the fight for thee,
He won the victory,
And thou art sanctified.

Our Baby.

When the morning, half in shadow,
Ran along the hill and meadow,
And with milk-white fingers parted
Crimson roses, golden-hearted;
Opening over ruins hoary
Every purple morning-glory,
And outshaking from the bushes
Singing larks and pleasant thrushes;
That's the time our little baby
Strayed from Paradise, it may be,
Came with eyes like heaven above her;
O, we could not choose but love her.

Not enough of earth for sinning,
Always gentle, always winning,
Never needing our reproving,
Ever lively, ever loving;
Starry eyes and sunset tresses,
Lips that knew no word of doubting,
Often kissing, never pouting;
Beauty even in completeness,
Overfull of childish sweetness;
That's the way our little baby,
Far too pure for earth, it may be,
Seemed to us, who while about her
Deemed we could not do without her.

When the morning, half in shadow,
Ran along the hill and meadow,
And with milk-white fingers parted
Crimson roses, golden hearted;
Opening over ruins hoary
Every purple morning-glory,
And outshaking from the bushes
Singing larks and pleasant thrushes;
That's the time our little baby,
Pining here for heaven, it may be,
Turning from our bitter weeping,
Closed her eyes as when in sleeping,
And her white hands on her bosom
Folded like a summer blossom.

Now the litter she doth lie on,
Strewed with roses, bear to Zion;
Go, as past a pleasant meadow,
Through the valley of the shadow;
Take her softly, holy angels,
Past the ranks of God s evangels;
Past the saints and masters holy
To the Earth-Born, meek and lowly,
We would have our precious blossom
Softly laid in Jesus' bosom. [Union Mag.

The Story of a Drunkard's Wife.

A daughter of New England, now a widowed mother in Ohio, has addressed a long letter to the Legislature of her adopted State, in which she urges them, by the magnitude of her wrongs, to suppress the liquor traffic. We copy that portion of the letter which narrates her own frightful experience:—

In early life I married a man who moved in the first circles of no mean city. He was a descendant of Puritan stock, and his venerable father's silvery locks yet command wide respect amid those who linger on Pilgrim ground. He was a worthy son of a worthy sire—a man among men. In the commercial world he stood fair among the fairest. Abundance blessed our board. If we had not wealth in hoarded profusion, we had enough for all our wants, and even the rich might have envied us our happiness. But when I dreamed of no danger, the foe, with serpentine dissembling, wound his coils around my loved and cherished one, and blighted my every earthly hope. Oh, never!—never shall I forget the agony of that hour, when first the full conviction flashed upon my mind that the father of my children—my own loved and cherished husband—was a drunkard! Oh, ye who revel in the wealth wrung from widow's tears, and hoard up gold coined from orphans' groans, were I a deamon damned, and wished to heap upon your devoted heads the coals of unquenchable fire, I could not wish you worse than that forced to my unwilling lips, and compelled me to drink, even to the deepest dregs.

But even then I knew not the power of my deadly foe. Hope, that angel of mercy, sprang up from the depths of despair, and with the frantic energy of the fire-surrounded victim of the prairie flames, I strove to release him from the grasp of the fell destroyer. I strove, oh God! thou knowest how hard I strove, to conceal from myself and others the truth. With my husband the struggle was equally severe, if not as ardent. He saw not at first the danger, but for my sake and his children's sake, he resolved that he would be free. Like Samson, he rose in all the conscious strength of manhood's prime; but like him, who dallied with an enemy, he, too, soon found out he was shorn of his strength, and yielded in abject submission to his deadliest foe. He was in the anaconda's folds, and as well might the lamb escape from the paw of the lion, as he from his eternal tormentor. Thrice, before God and man, he took the solemn pledge that he would no more yield to the tempter, and thrice he fell but to taste in all its renewed horors, a drunkard's hell. Oh yes, many, many times, when no eye but God's and my own witnessed his struggle, and when he knew not of my vigils, I have seen him prostrate and weeping as though his once manly heart would break, as he reviewed the past, and looked forward to the future. 'Twas then he realized his hopeless, irretrievable bondage! Yet he was not a gutter drunkard. He seldom reeled in the street; he was never a public, degraded sot. But he was in a demon's power, and, demon-like, he would in the ten thousand ways which shall forever remain nameless, harrow up my very soul, and render life a burden. Property vanished; friends grew cold; the proud despised us, and tongues of malice were dipped in gall. At this he saw with blurred vision, and sometimes keenly felt that he had brought it all upon those whom he loved dearer than life. Day and night I toiled; night and day I watched and prayed; yea, weeks and months and years I struggled, and by the free use of hands not ashamed to work, but heretofore all unused to toil, I, unaided by mortal arm, fed, clothed, and sheltered my little ones, and by main force held my degraded husband also. And while thus I gave up to sacred duty my choicest years of life, he who would have been, but for accursed drink, my protector and supporter, was driving deeper and deeper the barbed arrows into my life-springs, till at last, maniac-like, his cruel blows, of which no one knew or heard, drove me, and those whom God had given me, to seek shelter and protection where rum could not invade my sanctuary.

Need I tell you the anguish of that fatal hour? Need I tell you how it brought me to the very gates of death, whence, after many days, I barely escaped? Need I tell you how he who was thus forsaken, like Esau, in vain sought space for repentance and found it not, though he sought it carefully with tears? No—I need not tell you this. Nay, it is a tale that cannot be told—let it sleep. But I will tell you, that for the last time, he renewed, as with a dying struggle, the terrible conflict with his enemy. In vain he looked on this side and on that for help. Help there was none, but on every corner stood the tempter in bright array. All around him were men—men in the image of their God—men whom the law called good moral men, licensed by law to send his soul to hell and his body to the worms! Ah, too sure was their work, for as he had lived, so he died. In an instant, and when he looked not for it, death claimed his victim, and he was no more! No sympathizing hand smoothed his dying pillow! No daughter's kiss assuaged his last death-throes! no son was there to hear his last commands! His body fills a drunkard's grave. His murderers may meet his soul in a world to come.

Culture of the Strawberry.

BY THE EDITOR OF THE AMERICAN FARMER.

As no garden is complete in its appointments, without it has a bed or two of this delicious fruit—this luxurious and healthful source of enjoyment—we shall lay down a plan of culture, in the hope that it may call the attention of gentlemen, whose gardens are without them, to a necessity of planting one or more beds. A bed 30 feet square would yield an ample supply for a family, both to be eaten with sugar and cream, and for preserves. Where the supply is desired to be prolonged, one bed should be selected with a southern exposure, the other with a northern one—these differences in exposure will continue the supply fully two weeks longer, a matter of great importance with a fruit at once so grateful to the palate, and so health-giving to the system, in its indulgence.

SELECTION OF BED.—For an early supply, select a bed with a southern exposure—for a late supply, select a northern exposure.

SOIL.—The strawberry delights most in a moist soil—it is not material whether it be deep sandy loam, or a deep clay loam, so that it be moderately moist, but not wet. A clay loam, of proper texture, would probably produce most fruit; but not so early as a sandy loam. What we mean by proper texture of a clay loam, is one that is not very tenacious, but is friable, easily worked, and susceptible of being put in first-rate order.

PREPARATION OF THE BED.—Let the bed be trenched to the depth of 12 inches at least. When thus dug, a dressing of a compost manure must be spaded in. As the spading progresses, let the soil be thoroughly pulverized with a rake This done, put on a full dressing of compost formed of 4 parts well-rotted dung. 3 parts wood's-mould, or other rich mould, and 1 part slacked ashes, spade this in half spade deep, taking care to rake as the spading progresses, so as to bring the soil in fine tilth; and complete the work by passing the garden roller over the bed.

LAYING OFF THE BED.—Your bed having been prepared as before directed, divide it into compartments or beds, 4 feet wide, with alleys 2 feet wide between each, for the convenience of working, weeding, and gathering the fruit.

DISTANCE OF PLANTING THE VINES.—Make 3 rows of strawberries in each bed, and place vines 12 or 18 inches apart in the rows, according to the size of the variety.

TIME OF SETTING OUT THE PLANTS OR VINES.—In Spring this can be done in March, in the Southern States, in April and May in the Middle States, and in May in the North and East; in Summer, any time after the middle of August; in Autumn, during all September and October; if the fall be a very mild one, the planting may be continued till the middle of November. Beds set out in the fall or early in the spring, will bear crops the first year—those set out later, will bear the succeeding year.

MANAGEMENT OF NEWLY PLANTED BEDS.—After your vines are set out, place long straw or tanner's bark between the rows, to preserve moisture, and be careful to give the plants waterings every few days, until they take root, or a rain occurs. Beds planted in spring, must be watered in times of drouth, throughout the season, as the vines require moisture, and are injuriously affected by long-continued dry weather, unless thus assisted.

AFTER CULTURE.—During the first two seasons, cut off the runners before they have a chance to take root. Early in each spring, remove the straw, or tanner's bark, from between the rows, work the ground between the vines with a small hoe, and draw a little earth around them; then spread fresh straw, or tanner's bark, or, indeed, both, between the rows, to preserve moisture in the earth, and protect the fruit, when formed, from grit and sand. This done, (before your vines get into bloom,) give them a thorough watering with a solution of soot, made in the proportion of 6 or 8 quarts of soot to a hogshead of water. This is the very best manuring you can give them, as the soot contains all the substances they need to aid them in the formation of their fruit, they are in the best possible condition to be taken up by the plants, through their feeders or spongioles.

While the fruit is being formed, the vines, in dry weather, must be repeatedly watered; but, after they are in bloom, the utmost care must be observed not to wash off the farina of the flowers, as, should you do so, you will inevitably prevent the formation of the fruit. To avoid this, the nozzle of the watering pot must be held down to the ground, and the water suffered to escape moderately therefrom, so as not to splash upon the flowers. Early, each spring, strew a mixture of equal parts of plaster and salt over the bed, so as to whiten the soil.

After the vines have borne fruit the first year, say in the month of July, remove the straw, and weed the plants, remove all dead leaves, and give the vines a working with the hoe. This done, dig in with a fork a slight dressing of well-rotted manure or compost, a few inches in depth, say about 4; rake the ground, and leave it thus till, when long straw or tanner's bark, or both, must be replaced between the rows. The treatment, each succeeding year, must be as before advised, with the exception that the runners must be permitted to grow the fourth year to supply the plants for setting out a new bed, as the power of yielding fruit, abundantly, only lasts four years. Indeed, they begin to decrease after the second year. Some permit the runners to root the third year, place manure on the old vines, dig them in, and rake, leaving the rooted runners to form the bed of strawberries the ensuing three years. If pains be taken to give proper direction to the runners, in rooting, this plan saves the labor of transplanting and answers very well during one course. In manuring, ashes must not be forgotten in the compost, as the inorganic as well as the organic matters carried off by the corps of fruit, must be restored to the soil.

It would be best, however, to form new strawberry beds every fourth year.

CHOICE OF VARIETIES.—Where there are so many varieties of the same fruit, it is a difficult matter to make such a selection as will please all. Those which are grown in this market, mainly for sale, are the Large Early Scarlet, and the Large Pineapple; both are finely flavored, of large size, and productive; but we doubt much, if there be in the whole catalogue of this fruit, one variety of such exquisite, luscious flavor as the Early Virginia Scarlet, or one which, with cream and loaf sugar, as accompaniments, has half as many admirers; it is hardy, fruitful, and none the worse for being an old and well established variety, and for having been improved by reclamation and culture. Hovey's Seedling, from its immense size, has great popularity, and bears well when grown in the vicinity of a male variety. If this variety be cultivated, about every fourth or fifth row of plants should be of some staminate sort, to carry on necessary work of fecundation.

With the above varieties before him, no farmer need hesitate, if his garden is not already provided, to select and set out a bed; but as the garden is the rightful domain of his lady, we may be permitted to request of her—that, if there be no strawberries in her garden, to see that so radical an omission in its appointments, be at once filled up.

With respect to the spring treatment of strawberry beds, we will state what we consider a good practice. In the early part of March, if the weather be dry, select a day with a moderate breeze; fork up the old straw to be dried by the sun and air, spread it regularly over the bed; if the quantity is not sufficient to cover it, add more straw, and set fire to it. Thus you will get rid of dead leaves, and dead weeds and their seeds, in a few minutes. When the strawberry plants spring up, hoe and dress them with a compost, strew a mixture of salt, ashes, and plaster over them, cover the interval between the vines with straw, and cultivate as we have before laid down.

☞ In the management of your strawberry beds, recollect this truth—weeds and grass should never be permitted to grow in them.

The Power of the Pence.

The Rev. J. B. Owens, M. A., of Bilston, in the course of a lecture delivered in the Liverpool Concert Hall, in connection with the Church of England Institution, upon "Popular Insurance," related an anecdote, strikingly illustrative of the power which lies in the hands of the working-men to promote their own social comfort and independence, if they would only exert it:

A Manchester calico printer was, on his wedding day, persuaded by his wife to allow her two half pints of ale a day as her share. He rather winced under the bargain; for, though a drinker himself, he would have prefered a perfectly sober wife. They both worked hard, and he, poor man, was seldom out of the public house as soon as the factory closed. The wife and husband saw little of each other except at breakfast; but as she kept things tidy about her, and made her stinted and even selfish allowance for housekeeping meet the demands upon her, he never complained. She had her daily pint, and he, perhaps, had his two or three quarts; and neither interfered with the other, except when, at odd times, she succeeded, by dint of one little, gentle artifice, or another, to win him home an hour or two earlier at night, and now and then to spend an entire evening in his own house. But these were rare occasions.

They had been married a year; and on the morning of their wedding anniversary, the husband looked askance at her neat and comely person, with some shade of remorse, as he observed,

"Mary, we'n had no holiday sin' we were wed; and, only that I havn't a penny i' the world, we'd take a jaunt to the village to see the mother."

"Wouldst like to go, John?" asked she softly, between a smile and a tear, to hear him speak kindly as in old times. "If thee'd like to go, John, I'll stand treat."

"Thou stand treat," said he, with half a sneer; "hast got a fortune, wench?"

"Nay," said she, "but I'n gotten the pint o' ale."

"Gotten what?" said he.

"The pint o' ale," was the reply.

John still did not understand her, till the faithful creature reached down an old stocking from under a loose brick up the chimney, and counting out her daily pint of ale in the shape of three hundred and sixty-five threepences, (i. e., £4 11s. 3d.,) put it into his hand, exclaiming, "Thee shall have the holiday, John."

John was ashamed, astonished, conscience-smitten, charmed. He would not touch it. "Hasn't thee had thy share? then I'll ha' no more," he said.

They kept their wedding day with the old dame, and the wife's little capital was the nucleus of a series of investments that ultimately swelled into shop, factory, warehouse, country-seat, a carriage; and, for aught Mr. Owen knew, John was Mayor of his native borough at last.

Mother-of-Pearl—Curious Facts.

Mother-of-pearl is the hard, silvery, brilliant internal layer of several kinds of shells, particularly oysters, which is often variegated with changing purple and azure colors. The large oysters of the Indian seas alone secrete this coat of sufficient thickness to render their shells available to the purposes of manufactures. The genus of shell-fish called Pentadinæ furnishes the finest pearls, as well as mother-of-pearl; it is found in greater perfection round the coast of Ceylon, near Ormous, in the Persian Gulf, at Cape Comorin, and among some of the Australian seas. The brilliant hues of mother-of-pearl do not depend upon the nature of the substance, but upon its structure. The microscopic wrinkles or furrows which run across the surface of every slice, act upon the reflected light in such a way as produce the chromatic effect. Sir David Brewster has shown that if we take, with very black sealing-wax, or with the fusible alloy of D'Arcet, an impression of mother-of-pearl, it will present the iridescent appearance. Mother-of-pearl is very delicate to work, but it may be fashioned by saws, files, and drills, with the aid sometimes of a corrosive acid, such as the dilute sulphuric or muriatic, and it is polished by colcothars.

Sabbath steamboat disasters have been numerous the past year. In one period of five Sabbaths, five boats sent into eternity about one hundred souls.

Smoking Meat.

The best, most effectual, cheapest, and neatest manner of smoking meat that has ever come under my observation, is, to place a shovel of live coals in an old pan, or some low dish, and lay on them a few sugar-maple chips. Dry ones are the best, for it requires too much fire to use green ones. No other wood will produce so sweet smoke as sugar-maple; and the coals of it will keep alive as long, or longer, than the coals of other wood. In the absence of chips, we use corn cobs, which are nearly as good as chips. Three or four, laid on a few coals, will produce smoke sufficient to fill any ordinary smoke-house.

As a substitute for a smoke-house, we have been accustomed to use a molasses hogshead, covered with boards on the top, and a hole sawed in the side, near the bottom, large enough to admit a small pan of coals, with a cob or two, or a few small chips. Thus we avoid all danger of setting fire to the smoke-house, and consuming meat and all, and our meat is not "half baked," but presents a clean, copper-colored appearance.

Let those who have been accustomed to smoke their meat over a log-heap, adopt the mode of smoking it gently, and then say which way is the best. [Albany Cultivator.

The Wife of Sir John Franklin.

Eleanor Ann Porden was born in 1795. She early manifested great talents and a strong memory, and acquired a considerable knowledge of Greek and other languages. Her first poem, "The Veils," was written when she was seventeen. Her next was "The Arctic Expedition," which led to her marriage with Captain Franklin. Her principal work is the epic of "Cœur de Lion," which appeared in 1825. Her poems display much elegance, spirit, and richness of imagination. This lady has recently attracted the attention and excited the admiration of the civilized world, by her energetic and persevering efforts to send relief to her adventurous husband in the frozen regions of the north, or to ascertain his fate, and that of his companions. Such devoted affection deserves to be rewarded by the safe return of her husband, and all would rejoice to hear of her warmest hopes being gratified. It is worthy of note, that the only trace of him was first seen by American vessels.

Fire-Flies

A gentleman trading from California to Vera Cruz, came across millions of fire-flies, near Jalapa, one of the most beautiful cities in Mexico. He says the road from this point was lined with a dense chapperel, which was brilliantly illuminated with myriads of fire-flies. These are a bug about the size of an ordinary roach, and emit a light almost equal to that of a small wax taper. It is not the occasional sparkle of the little fire-fly of our country, but a continual blaze, proceeding from the eyes, as well as two points beneath the wing. Several of these insects, placed in a glass jar, will give sufficient light by which to read the smallest print; and when one rises in the air to any considerable height, it resembles a beautiful meteor slowly crossing the heavens. A number of them flying through the air in different directions, on a dark night, present a very pretty appearance, well calculated to excite the wonder, if not superstitious fears of a person unacquainted with the cause of no strange a phenomenon.

ADVENTURES AND SUFFERINGS OF A DUKE.—Paul Wilhelm, Duke of Wirtemburg, who has been traveling, last summer and fall, in the western wilds, has lately published in the Allgemeine Zeitung, a short sketch of his adventures, from which it appears that on the 26th of October he fell into the hands of a band of Indians near the mouth of the Southern Platte, who robbed him and his companions of all they possessed, and grieviously ill-treated them in the bargain. He fared, however, still worse on the 14th of November. An awful snow-storm broke over the hapless wanderer; his three horses died, one after another; with difficulty could he continue on foot for fifteen miles further, when, at last, near the mouth of the Big Sandy Creek, his strength gave way and he laid himself down, as he thought, to rise no more. Already were his limbs stiff and his sense began to forsake him, when the mail-riders from Fort Laramie found the wretched Duke, and carried him with great difficulty to Independence, Missouri, where, under the most hospitable care of its generous inhabitants, he soon recovered his health and strength. The Duke expresses great gratitude to the people of Independence.

SINGLE VISION WITH TWO EYES.—As we have two eyes, and a separate image of every external object is formed in each, it may be asked, Why do we not see double? The answer is, It is a matter of habit. Habit alone teaches us, that the sensation of sight correspond to any thing external, and shows to what they correspond. Thus, place a wafer on a table before you; direct your eyes to it, that is, bring its image on both retinæ to those parts which habit has ascertained to be the most sensible, and best situated for seeing distinctly, and you will see only the single wafer. But, while looking at the wafer, squeeze the upper part fo one eye downwards, by pressing on the eyelid with the finger, and thereby forcibly throw the image on another part of the retinæ of that eye, and a double vision will be immediately produced; that is, two wafers will be distinctly seen, which will appear to recede from each other as the pressure is stronger, and approach, and finally blend into one, as it is relieved. The same effect may be produced without pressure, by directing the eyes to a point nearer to, or farther from them, than the wafer; the optic axis, in this case, being both directed away from the object seen.

LONDON JOURNALISM.—It is a remarkable fact, that the total number of newspapers and magazines published in London is not greater now than it was twenty years ago. During that period upwards of 200 new newspapers and magazines have been started, and after a struggle of more or less duration, and involving their proprietors in enormous losses, have perished and passed away. It is estimated that only one periodical in a hundred that is begun is ultimately successful; and that even the most successful incur heavy losses for many years. A still more startling fact, which the most experienced positively assert, is, that the entire newspaper press of London (with the exception of the Times) does not pay its own expenses; that is to say, that the annual loss by all those which do not pay equals the annual profits of all those which yield a profit.

BAPTISTS IN KENTUCKY.—The Editor of the Western Recorder, the Baptist paper in Louisville, thus reports the result of his observations during a late visit to Georgetown and Frankfort, the central part of Kentucky:

"We were deeply pained to meet with so much destitution. Many of our most important churches are now without the stated ministry of the Word. The Frankfort church has no resident minister, and preaching only once a month. The Georgetown church is at present without a pastor, but it has a sufficient number of able ministers to supply the pulpit until some one is called to the pastorship. Danville, Harrodsburg, Lawrenceburg, and Shelbyville, are without stated Baptist preaching. All these are important churches, and at important points, and all anxious to obtain the services of a suitable minister. But where are they to come from? The harvest truly is great, but the laborers are few. There never was at any former period such a destitution of the Word in Kentucky. All the churches should hold special seasons of prayer to the Lord of the harvest, that he would send forth more laborers into his vineyard."

MOTION OF THE EYE.—On entering a room, we imagine that we see the whole side of it at once, as the cornice, the pattern of the paper-hanging, pictures, chairs, &c., but we are deceived; for each object is rapidly, but singly presented to the eye by its constant motion. If the eye were steady, vision would be lost. For example, fix the eye on one point, and you will find the whole scene become more and more obscure, till it vanishes. Then, if you change the direction of the eye ever so little, at once the whole scene will be again perfect before you.

MODERN INVENTIONS.—Horace Mann thus sums up a few of the advantages of modern inventions: "One boy, with a Fourdrinier machine, will make more paper in a twelve-month than all Egypt could have made in a hundred years during the reign of the Ptolemys. One girl, with a power press, will strike off books faster than a million scribes could copy them before the invention of printing. One man, with an iron foundry, will turn out more utensils than Tubal Cain could have forged had he worked diligently till this time."

VARIETY.

A correspondent describes the oldest house in Manchester, Mass., as a curiously built dwelling, having two stories on the front, and one in the rear, mostly constructed of oak timber, and set on a rock, where the people of the present day would no more think of placing a house than they would on the Himmaleh Mountains. This house was built in 1643, and is therefore about two hundred and nine years old—was one of the first put up in the town, and its original proprietor was Shadrach Norton. The bricks in the chimney are a great curiosity, some of them weighing from eight to ten pounds each. The house is now occupied by an aged lady, a descendant of Shadrach Norton.

It has been generally supposed, that the Natural Bridge of Va. was the only geological wonder of the kind in the country. This is a mistake. In Carter County, Ky., there is a Natural Bridge across the Rockbridge branch of the Cany Fork of Little Sandy. It is 195 feet span, 12 feet wide, 20 feet thick in the middle of the arch, and 107 feet above the water. In the County of Walker, in Alabama, there is another similar natural curiosity, which was discovered in a recent geological exploration. The span is 120 feet, and the hight nearly 70. The bridge is formed of sand stone, and is very symmetrical. Large beech and hemlock trees grow on the bridge, and the surrounding scenery is represented as sublime.

Robert Burns, on his way to Leith one morning, met a country farmer; he shook him earnestly by the hand, and stopped to converse awhile. A young Edinburgh blood took the poet to task for this defect of taste. "Why, you fantastic gomeril," said Burns, "it was not the great coat, the scone bonnet, and the saundaer-boot hose I spoke to, but the man that was in them; and the man, sir, for true worth, would weigh down you and me, and ten more such any day."

The food necessary to sustain animal life has to perform, among other functions, that of developing, by its combustion in the lungs, a certain quantity of heat. The colder the surrounding atmosphere, the more is expended for that purpose. Hence the question, which is the more economical? To produce the required heat by burning oats, corn, hay, &c., in an animated furnace, or coal or wood in a stove?

A rock in the sea-port of Fellbaeka, called Gadmunds-Schare, and situated lat. 58° 84', was, in 1532, two feet below the surface of the water; in 1662, it was only 8 inches under it; in 1742, it had risen 2 feet above; and in 1844, it had an elevation of 4 feet above the sea. There has been, consequently, an elevation of 6 feet in three centuries, or 1 foot every fifty years.

Manchester, in England, is unquestionably the greatest manufacturing city in the world. The annual value of Cotton manufactures of that city, is $235,000,000; that of the Woolen manufacture of the same place is $100,000,000; and that of the Linen manufacture $69,000,000. The Silk manufacture is also quite large, but the amount we have not seen stated.

A woman named Ann Small was recently convicted in St. Louis of being a vagrant, and required to give $500 security for her good behavior. She forthwith handed over $500 in gold as collateral security, and $50 for a fine which had been imposed on her, not however, with the slightest idea of getting it.

A religion that does not constrain a man to pay his just debts, when he has the ability to do it, is worth nothing. That he can escape his liabilities through some defect of human law, will never justify him at the bar of conscience and God, for defrauding others of their due.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June of each year.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress.
Rev. J W. MORTON, } Assistants.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, }

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—
The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term; but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term, Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00
Monochromatic Painting	3 00
Oil Painting,	5 00
Writing and Stationery,	0 50
Vocal Music, Elementary,	1 00
Advanced Class,	2 00
Instrumental Music,	8 00

Use of Organ or Piano, $2 00 per quarter.

BOARD, in private families, per week, from $1 25 to $1 50; in clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter Term, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the common school branches, with daily lectures on "The Art of Teaching," Chemistry, Physiology, Laws of Health, School Laws, &c., &c., Tuition $2 50.

Students should not be furnished with unnecessary pocket-money, neither should minors be allowed to contract debts in the village. Either member of the Faculty will superintend the financial affairs of pupils placed under their care, by special direction from parents and guardians, if funds are furnished in advance.

THE JEWS IN PALESTINE.

From the "Narrative of a Mission of Inquiry to the Jews from the Church of Scotland in 1839." (Continued.

In the afternoon we spent five hours in receiving from Mr. Nicolayson full information regarding the number and condition of the Jews in Palestine. The Committee of our Church who sent us forth, had furnished us with a list of questions to be investigated and answered. These we shall set down in order, with the infomation we received in reply to them.

I. What is the number of Jews in Jerusalem and in the Holy Land?

We have already set down briefly the answer to this question. A few more particulars may be added. In Jerusalem 1000 Jews pay taxes, and all of these are males from thirteen years old and upwards. The Jews marry when very young, so that, allowing five to a family, there are 5000 Jews, represented by the 1000 who pay taxes, in Jerusalem. Foreign Jews, however, such as Russians, Poles, and Hungarians, and many others, continue under the protection of European powers, and pay no taxes. These may amount to 2000, which would give about 7000 Jews to Jerusalem. This is the largest statement of the number of the Jews in the Holy City that we any where received, and is no doubt above the real amount; for the average of five to a family appears to be far too great.

The destruction of Saphet by an earthquake in 1837 occasioned the dispersion of many of the Jews who dwelt there. Of these, some settled at Acre, and some at Jerusalem. In the cities along the coast, the Jews have been increasing of late. In Tyre, formerly a Jew was not allowed to spend a night; but the Pasha's government changed the law, and now a congregation and rabbi have settled there. They are chiefly from the Barbary coast. The recent occupation of Algiers by the French enabled the Jews of that coast to claim protection as French subjects, and this induces them to leave home more freely for purposes of trade. The same class of Jews are found in Sidon and Beyrout. At the utmost, the whole Jewish population of Palestine may be reckoned at about 12,000. This is the largest estimate which we received; yet, comparing it with their numbers in the days of Solomon, we may well say, in the words of Isaiah, there are "few men left."

II. Has the number of Jews in Palestine been increasing of late years?

Their numbers did increase decidedly during the first five years of the Pasha's government, that is, from 1832 to 1837—a time which coincides with the occupation of Algiers by the French. Many came from the Barbary coast, who settled chiefly at Saphet and on the coast. During the last two years there has been little or no increase. There is always an influx, but then the mortality is great, and the number that come do not more than supply the places of those cut off. The change of climate, at the advanced period of life in which many come, the new habits which the country forces them to form, their being crowded together in damp, unwholesome residences, all combine to shorten their days. This diminution in the numbers of Jews returning to their own land, seems to be caused by the ravages which the plague has been making for two years past; by the rise in the price of provisions; by the embarrassed finances of the Jewish community, their debt amounting to nearly £8000; and by the oppressions which they suffer from their rabbies. Some have actually left, and several have said that they would gladly leave Jerusalem if it were in their power. Their reasons for coming into the land are—1. The universal belief that every Jew who dies out of the land must perform a subterraneous passage back to it, that he may rise in the valley of Jehoshaphat. 2. They believe that to die in this land is certain salvation, though they are not exempted from the 'beating in the grave, and the eleven months of purgatory.' 3. They believe that those who reside here have immediate communication with Heaven, and that the rabbies are in a manner inspired. 4. They expect the appearing of Messiah. The Jews in Palestine have always cherished the hope of his coming, and of their own restoration. This opinion has now even more weight with them than formerly, for they partake of the general impression that a crisis is approaching. The Jews here, as a nation, are far from infidel, but there are many whose minds are fully occupied with their miseries.

III. Are the Jews in Palestine supported by their brethren in other parts of the world?

Generally speaking, they are all supported by a yearly contribution made by their brethren in other lands. All foreign Jews residing in Palestine are entirely dependent on contributions from Europe, except a few who have property in Europe. These last either bring their little property with them, or make it over to friends in Europe, on condition of their sending them an annual sum to the Holy Land, upon which they live here. But even these may receive their share, as every Jew, rich or poor, who has been one year in the country, has a share allotted to him if he chooses to take it. The sum received by each individual is very small; much is swallowed up by their differences and quarrels, and much is required to pay the interest of their debt. Five ducats, or about £3, 10s. a head, is thought a good contribution. At present, however, it is even smaller. The way of collecting the European contributions used to be this. Messengers were sent from Jerusalem to the different cities in Europe, where collections were made, and these brought the money to Palestine. This was a very expensive method, for nearly one-fourth of the sum collected was spent in paying the expenses of the messengers. Of late years, however, another plan has been adopted. The money is sent to Amsterdam, where it is received by a rich Jewish merchant, Hirsh Lehren, called on this account "President of the Holy Land," and he transmits it to the Austrian Consul at Beyrout, by whom it is conveyed to the Jews at Jerusalem. The average amount may be 7000 ducats = 14,000 dollars = 280,000 piasters, or £2800. But there is something to be deducted even from this. Often there is a kedamah; that is, something to be paid out to individuals before the sum is distributed. A list of these is kept. They are persons who have been specially named by friends in Europe who sent the money. The largest collections come from Amsterdam; not much from Britain. Some Jews, chiefly Spanish, are supported by being readers in the places devoted to study yishvioth. A small sum is appropriated by legacy to each of the persons who are chosen to study there. This yields perhaps 100 or 150 piasters a year to the individual.

IV. Is there kept up constant aud rapid communication between the Jews in Palestine, and those in other parts of the world?

The rabbies of Palestine maintain a constant communication with their brethren all over the world. In one respect, indeed, it may be said, that Jerusalem is not the center of Jewish influence; for there is little outgoing from it; the Jews are stationary there; yet, on the other hand, it is true that Jerusalem is the heart of the nation, and every thing done there or in the Holy Land will tell upon the whole Jewish world. When conversions take place, although they wish to keep them quiet, still the intelligence is soon communicated, and known and spoken of every where. A Jew said lately to Mr. Nicolayson, that he believed that in a short time no young Jews would be allowed to come to the Holy Land, if the missionaries continued to labor as they were doing. They would trust only old confirmed Jews there, who would be able to meet their arguments. The communication, however, is by no means rapid, being carried on by means of messengers. Much mischief has often arisen from this system, for the rabbies sometimes intercept the letters of poor Jews, which they fear may be complaining of their conduct.

V. From what countries do the Jews principally come?

The greatest numbers come from Poland, and the Austrian dominions. Many come from Russia, and many more would come if they were not hindered. There are some from Wallachia and Moldavia; a few from Germany; a few from Holland; but scarcely any from Britain. All these being Europeans receive the name of Ashkenazim. The native Jews, that is, those Jews who are subjects of the country, are called Sephardim, and are almost all of Spanish extraction. They come principally from Turkey in Europe, from Saloniki, Constantinople, and the Dardanelles. Those who come from Asia Minor, are chiefly from Smyrna. Many have come from Africa, especially of late years, from Morocco and the Barbary coast, from Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli. These bring French passports, and are therefore under potection. There are a few from Alexandria and Cairo. Mr. Nicolayson never saw any Jews from India, though several have gone to India and returned. They have occasional communication by individuals with Yemen and Sennah. There are many Spanish Jews, and several Polish families, who have been here for generations, whose fathers and grandfathers have died here, and who are really natives of Palestine. But most even of these count themselves foreigners still, and they generally contrive to make a tour to Europe some time in their life.

VI. Are there many Rabbies in Palestine?

There is often a great mistake made about the rank of those who get the title of Rabbi. The truth is, all are included in that class who are not in the class am haretz, that is, the uneducated. Formerly, the Rabbies were a kind of clergy, and were appointed by laying on of hands, but now there is no such distiction. The official Rabbi does not even preside in the synagogue, but deputes this to another, the Hazan, who is often chosen because of his fine voice. The only part of the duty which is reserved peculiarly for the priest, is the pronouncing the blessing. None but a Cohen, a priest of Aaron's line, can give this. In the synagogue any one may be called up to read. This custom appears to be as old as the days of our Lord. The only distinction made is, that first a Cohen is called up to read, then a Levite, then a common Israelite. Most of the Jews in the Holy Land spend their time in a sort of study or reading. Crowded in their families, however, they cannot really devote themselves to study; and their disputes also are a great hinderance. They study nothing but Talmudical books, and even in this department there is none of them who can be called learned when compared with Jews in Europe.

The Yishvioth are not seats of learning; they are rather situations of emolument, though originally intended to encourage learning. There are nominally thirty-six of these reading-places in Jerusalem, but often the books belonging to two or three are collected into one. These have been established by individuals for behoof of their souls. They left a little money to furnish them, and to enable a few persons to devote themselves to study there, and to be trained up in the law, for this is a zechuth, or deed of merit. Five or six readers are elected to each of them, one or two of whom are expected to be always reading the Talmud there, and each of these receives 100 or 150 piasters a year to maintain him. These appointments are obtained by favor and private influence. In many cases the rooms are much neglected.

VII. What are the peculiar characteristics of the Jews in Palestine?

Their principal characteristic is, that they are all strict Rabbinists, though in this they can hardly be said to differ from the Polish Jews. They are also superstitious in the extreme. Their real characteristic may be inferred from the fact, that those who come are the elite of the devotional and strictly religious Jews of other countries. They have so little trade that their covetousness and cheating are turned upon one another.

VIII. What are the feelings of the Jews in Palestine towards Christianity?

IX. What success has attended the efforts hitherto made for their conversion?

These two questions involve each other. The first effort of the London Society in this country was made in the year 1820 by a Swiss clergyman named Tschudi, who was employed chiefly in distributing the Scriptures to the Jews. Joseph Wolff then made two visits to Jerusalem, and had a good deal of personal intercourse with the Jews. He was always enabled to leave this impression behind him, that Christians were really seeking their conversion, and that without Christ there is no forgiveness. Soon after, Mr. Lewis Waje came to the East with the view of forming a mission, accompanied by Mr. Lewis, an Irish clergyman, (the same whose kindness and Christian hospitality we afterwards enjoyed,) and by several converted Jews. He rented a convent at Antoura, intending to make it a place where missionaries might prepare themselves; but ill health forced him to return home. In 1824, Dr. Dalton, a medical man, was sent out to aid Mr. Lewis in forming a settlement in Jerusalem; but the latter returned home that same autumn. Upon this, Dr. Dalton made an arrangement with two American Missionaries who had arrived, named King and Pliny Fiske, to rent one of the small convents for their establishment. Pliny Fiske, however, died in November, 1825, before the arrangement was completed; and Dr. Dalton was again left alone. It was to aid him that Mr. Nicolayson was sent out to this country in December, 1825. But very soon after his arrival, Dr. Dalton died, in January, 1826, of an illness caught on a tour to Bethlehem. Mr. Nicolayson returned to Beyrout, and studied the language more thoroughly during that winter. In the summer of the same year, 1826, a rebellion broke out, and Mr. Nicolayson retired to Saphet, and lived there till June, 1827, having much intercourse with the Jews. Considerable impression was made, and the rabbies grew jealous of him. They threatened to excommunicate the man who let him his house, and the woman who washed his clothes, so that he was forced to return to Beyrout. He now left the country for four years, and traveled on the Barbary coast. In 1832 he returned, and came to Beyrout with his family, at the time when the Pasha had nearly taken Acre. The country was now quite open, so that he spent the summer at Sidon, and had intercourse with Christians and Jews. He was beginning to build a cottage there, when the jealousy of the Greek priests threw obstacles in his way. In 1833 Mr. Calman came, and he and Mr. Nicolayson made a tour together to the holy cities. Mr. Calman's sweetness of temper and kindly manner gained upon the Jews exceedingly. At Jerusalem they consulted with Ysa Petros, a Greek priest, who was very friendly, as to the practicability of renting a house in that city. They visited Tiberias, and had many discussions with the Jews, the results of which were often very encouraging, and last of all spent an interesting fortnight at Saphet. On returning to Beyrout, they found that two American Missionaries had arrived, on their way to Jerusalem to labor among the native Christians. They all resolved to attempt the renting of a house in the Holy City. Accordingly, in the autumn of 1833, Mr. Nicolayson and family removed to Jerusalem, to the house on Mount Zion, where he now lives, and spent a quiet, comfortable winter. In the spring of 1834, Mr. Thomson, an American Missionary, arrived, and about the same time the rebellion broke out. One Sabbath morning they found themselves environed, the soldiers having left the town to the mercy of the Fellahs. The earthquake happened the same day. They were shut up in their dwelling till the Friday when Ibraim arrived, but remained in a state of siege for five or six weeks. During ten days they had to live upon rice alone. Then sickness followed. Mrs. Thomson, of the American Mission, died of brain fever, produced by the alarm and other circumstances. Mrs. Nicolayson was ill for three or four weeks, and Mr. Nicolayson fell ill soon after, so that they had to leave for Beyrout, and thus lost that summer. In the spring of 1835, Dr. Dodge and Mr. Whiting, two more American Missionaries, arrived. Mr. Whiting boarded with Mr. Nicolayson in Jerusalem, but Dr. Dodge died in the middle of the same year he came out. From this time the Jewish Mission may be accounted as established in the Holy City. In 1835, the subject of a Hebrew church on Mount Zion was started in England, and in 1836 Mr. Nicolayson was called to England to consult regarding it. He returned in July, 1837, and labored alone in Jerusalem for a year. But in July, 1838, Mr. Pieritz and Mr. Levi, converted Jews, but not in orders, were sent out to strengthen the mission here; and in December, Dr. Gertsmann, and his assistant, Mr. Bergheim, both converted Jews, and both medical men, arrived. They have thus made Jerusalem the center of the Mission to the Jews in Palestine. Mr. Young, the English Consul, had fixed his quarters here about three months before our arrival. The efforts made have been blessed to the conversion of some Jews in Jerusalem, though it is still the day of small things. A Jew named Simeon, was awakened at Bucharest by reading a New Testament and some tracts, which he received from a Jew who did not understand them. He was convinced, but had many difficulties which he could not get over. A converted Jew came and preached at Bucharest, and advised him to go to the Missionaries at Constantinople. He went, but could not find them out. He proceeded to Smyrna, where he met with another inquiring Jew named Eliezer. Mr. Nicolayson was in Smyrna at the time, on his way to Jerusalem. When Simeon heard that a Missionary from the Holy City was there, he immediately came to him, and opened up his mind. Mr. Nicolayson brought him as a servant to Jerusalem. During Mr. Nicolayson's absence in 1836–7, he was under the care of Mr. Calman. His wife for a long time refused to follow him from Wallachia, and bitterly opposed his change; but being induced to come to Jerusalem, and being regularly instructed by Mr. Pieritz, and also affected by an illness, she gave good evidence of having undergone a saving change, and now she speaks like a missionary to her country-women. The whole family, consisting of Simeon, his wife, a boy, and girl, were baptized in Jerusalem after last Easter. This is the family at whose house we heard the German service last Sabbath day. Another case was that of Chaii, or Hyman Paul, an amiable young Jew, an acquaintance of Simeon, who became intelligently convinced of the truth. He was baptized last Pentecost, and at his own desire sent to England.

The first native Jew awakened at Jerusalem was Rabbi Joseph, in September, 1838. He was a learned young man, and so bitterly was his change opposed by the Jews, that the Missionaries were obliged to send him away to Constantinople before he was baptized. Three rabbies have very lately become inquirers after the truth, and seem determined to profess Christianity openly. We afterwards received a fuller account of these two last cases from Mr. Pieritz. These are all the known fruits of the Mission in the way of conversion.

When Rabbi Joseph was awakened, a herem or ban of excommunication was pronounced in the synagogues against the Missionaries, and all who should have dealing with them. But when Dr. Gerstmann, the medical man, came in December, the Jews immediately began to break through it. Another herem was pronounced, but in vain. No one regarded it, and Rabbi Israel refused to pronounce it, saying that he would not be the cause of hindering his poor and sick brethren from going to be healed. This interesting fact shows the immense value of the medical missionary.

The more general fruits of the establishment of the Mission have been these: 1. The distinction between true and false Christianity has been clearly opened up before the eyes of the Jews. 2. The study of the Old Testament has been forced upon them; so that they cannot avoid it. 3. The Word of God has become more and more the only ground of controversy. The authority of the Talmud is not now appealed to; the only dispute about it being whether it is to be referred to at all, or what is its real value?

The support of inquirers and converts is one of the chief difficulties that meets a Missionary here. The institution of a printing press, to afford them both manual and mental labor, has been proposed. An hospital for the sick has also been set on foot.

X. What modes of operation have been employed?

The mode of operation is entirely by personal intercourse. The Missionaries frequently make tours to other towns, and dispose of copies of the Old Testament. Mr. Nicolayson has sold about 5000 Hebrew Bibles. They never dispose of the New Testament, except to those in whom they have confidence. They at one time sold a box of fifty New Testaments, bound up with the Old. But they afterwards found the New Testament torn out, and blank leaves inserted instead, with Jarchi's Commentary written on them. The Jews will not take tracts except privately. Many of their Old Testaments have been conveyed to Bagdad, and to India.

XI. How far is the health of the Missionaries affected by the climate?

The climate of Jerusalem is decidedly healthy. The sicknesses and deaths among the Missionaries above mentioned, can hardly be attributed to the climate. Dr. Dalton was very delicate when he came; Mrs. Thomson died of brain fever; and Dr. Dodge's death was occasioned by a hurried journey, in which he was much exposed.

XII. What kind of house accommodation is there, and what is the expense of living in Palestine?

The house accommodation in Jerusalem is tolerably comfortable. One of the Missionaries pays £15, and another £17 a year, as house-rent. In the winter it is difficult to keep the houses dry, the rain causing much dampness; but the sorest privations are want of Christian society, and public means of grace. A Missionary here meets with many trials which he did not anticipate. He must have great patience, and must make up his mind to suffer delays and disappointments, which are much more trying than merely temporal privations which are really small. A Missionary coming out must not expect full work at once, he must be willing to stand by and wait. Often we may say, "His strength is to sit still." The Christian Missionary enjoys perfect liberty to carry on his operations under the Egyptian government, more so, indeed, than under the British government at Malta or in India. No one inquires what he is about.

Provisions are easily got; but the expense of living is rising continually. The price of food is now double what it once was, and some things are four times as high as when Mr. Nicolayson first came. This arises from there being more money in the country. If boarding could be obtained in Jerusalem, then an individual might easily live here on less than £100 a year. But this is not to be had, so that a Missionary must keep a house and servants, and lay up stores for the season. This is the only way of managing here; and this would require at least £100 a year. In addition to the salaries of the Missionaries, the London Society pay all the traveling expenses of their missionary tours.

Singing at Work.—Give us, O, give us the man who sings at his work! Be his occupation what it may, he is equal to any of those who follow the same pursuit in silent sullenness. He will do more in the same time, he will do it better, he will persevere longer. One is scarcely sensible to fatigue whilst he is marching to music. The very stars are said to make harmony as they revolve in their spheres. Wondrous the strength of cheerfulness—altogether past calculating its powers of endurance. Efforts, to be permanently useful, must be uniformly joyous, a spirit of sunshine—graceful from very gladness—beautiful because bright.

THE ANGEL'S GREETING.

"Hark! they whisper—Angels say,
Sister spirit, come away."—Pope.

Come to the land of peace,
Come where the tempest hath no longer away,
The shadow passes from the soul away—
The sounds of weeping cease.

Fear hath no dwelling there!
Come to the mingling of repose and love,
Breathed by the silent spirit of the dove
Through the celestial air!

Come to the bright and blest,
And crown'd for ever! 'midst the shining band
Gather'd to Heaven's own wreath from every land,
Thy spirit shall find rest!

Thou hast been long alone;
Come to thy mother!—on the Sabbath shore,
The heart that rock'd thy childhood, back once more
Shall take its wearied one.

In silence wert thou left;
Come to thy sisters!—joyously again
All the home-voices, blent in one sweet strain,
Shall greet their long bereft.

Over thine orphan head
The storm hath swept, as o'er a willow's bough;
Come to thy Father!—it is finished now;
Thy tears have all been shed.

In thy divine abode,
Change finds no pathway, memory no dark trace,
And oh! bright victory—death by love no place;
Come, spirit, to thy God!

APPEAL FOR PRAYER.

The Board of the American Bible Union affectionately address all those who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincereity:—

Dearly Beloved Brethren and Sisters: The importance of faithfulness and accuracy, in the revision of the English Scriptures, cannot be too highly appreciated. "Every word of God is pure." No one can calculate the pernicious consequences of an erroneous, obscure, or imperfect translation of a single passage. Bishop Horne, in his celebrated Introduction to the Study of the Holy Scriptures, states that "the hardening of Pharoah's heart [which idea he regards as the result of an erroneous translation] has been a fruitful source of malignant cavil with the adversaries of the Bible; some of whom have not hesitated to affirm that this single chapter is sufficient to destroy the authenticity of the entire Scriptures."

Every experienced Christian knows, that the most minute portions of God's holy word are precious.

Blessed by the Spirit's influence, they become sweeter than manna to the taste, while they impart renewedvigor to the soul. A single word or phrase is sometimes made by God the means of awakening sinners, and more frequently of comforting and edifying His saints. How unspeakably important, then, to remove every covering from divine revelation, and to let the Lamp of Life shine forth in all its native clearness and brightness!

* * * * * *

In respect to the English Scriptures, the importance of a faithful revision is enhanced by numerous considerations, among which are the following:

1. The English is our mother tongue. The Apostles were commanded to begin at Jerusalem. While we are seeking to give pure versions to the heathen, we should have primary regard to our own countrymen.

2. It is not improbable that the English language will prevail among more than half the population of the globe.

3. The nations who use this language are the most enterprising in the world, and the most influential.

4. Pure religion in its forms, its doctrines, and its practices, is more prevalent among them than with other nations, and from this springs a holy missionary spirit; so that, under God, the world mainly depends for the maintenance and propagation of true Christianity upon those who use the English Scriptures.

5. The character of versions among the heathen is very largely influenced by that of the English. Most evangelical missionaries follow the rule, which, Rev. Francis Mason states, guided him in the Karen Scriptures: "When the signification of a passage was doubtful in the translator's mind, it has been his rule to render according to the English."

6. Notwithstanding such influence, which has a tendency in cases of doubt to make the English version the umpire, there are so many clear cases of error in it, that the versions made by our missionaries differ from it in numerous and very important particulars in which the English is wrong, and the others right.

7. Not a commentator has written upon the common version, who has not discovered and pointed out erroneous translations.

8. Not a minister acquainted with the originals, has preached for any length of time without finding the necessity of correcting the version.

9. The duty is one of present, daily, and familiar consequence. While the effects of its proper discharge must deeply influence future generations and the world in general, they must be immediately and powerfully felt among ourselves in our families, throughout our country, and they must greatly promote the piety of the Christian and the glory of Him who gave the word for the benefit of mankind.

Impressed by these and similar considerations, the Board of the American Bible Union are profoundly sensible of the need of Divine guidance in their endeavors to secure a faithful revision of the common English version. They especially feel this need at the present time, when many of the revisors employed by them, both in England and America, are commencing their work. The Board of Managers realize their dependence upon the direction of God in all their operations; but they see more than usual reasons for combined and fervent supplications for heavenly grace and wisdom to influence the hearts and guide the judgment of those distinguished scholars to whom they have been led by the providence of God to entrust the duty of examining and correcting the English version.

Influenced by such views and feelings, they appeal to you, as the children of God and lovers of His truth, and earnestly entreating you to remember the American Bible Union and its great objects at the throne of heavenly grace, and especially to supplicate, that the revisors of the English version may be kept from error of every kind, and be enabled, by the aid and guidance of the Holy Spirit, to render the translation so accurate and faithful, that it shall be a correct transcript of His mind, as conveyed in the divine originals. Spencer H. Cone, President.

THE WAR WITH BURMAH.

Those who have anxiously inquired what effect the present War would probably have on missionary operations in Burmah, will read with interest the following extract from a letter written by the Baptist missionary Kincaid, under date of Dec. 23. We copy from the Christian Chronicle.

"Our families are safe and comfortable on board ships, though all our books and other property is still on shore, and Dr. Dawson and I, together with all other foreigners, are obliged to watch with unceasing vigilance, especially by night, to save our property from robbers. This state of things cannot last long. There will either be peace or war the first week in January. Every thing now indicates war, and if war takes place the proud throne of Alompra will be overthrown for ever. Commodore Lambert, with a Frigate of fifty guns and two armed steamers, came here to redress the outrages committed on British subjects. His demand was the removal from office of the Viceroy of Rangoon; and thirty-five days were given for an answer from the Imperial Court. If this demand is not complied with, all friendly intercourse is to cease. Secret instructions have been received from Ava to drive away the foreigners. Hostile preparations are being made with great energy, and to-day the Viceroy sent a most insulting message to the Commodore, and said he was ready to fight at any moment. The wrongs and outrages endured by British subjects, especially during the administration of this Governor, beggars all description. During the past eight months I have seen about 100 British subjects in prison—many of them in irons and in blocks—some of them cruelly tortured—two whipped to death—and one female so cruelly tortured and beaten (eight month gone in a family way) that she died soon after—all, for purposes of extortion. He threatened my life the third day after our arrival in Rangoon. The justice of heaven has overtaken him at last. He is now enraged to madness. He has been upheld by the favorite Queen. On the 10th of this month, a little after dark, I was surrounded and seized by a large number of armed men and handled very roughly for more than an hour. I do not go about much in the evening now. There are between ten and fifteen thousand troops in and around Rangoon now. Our Burman and Karen disciples pray most earnestly that the King and Court may continue the mad course, pursued so blindly heretofore, and compel the English to put an end to the brutal tyranny under which they have so long groaned in bitter agony."

A BIBLE LEAF IN THE WIND.

A young man of New Jersey, about twenty, was engaged in the labors of the farm during the early part of the summer 18—. He was walking leisurely with cart and oxen along the public road, when his eye caught sight of a little piece of paper, which a breath of passing wind gently stirred up and set in motion. He walked on. Curiosity, however, was excited. He stopped, went back, and picked up the paper to see what it might be. It was the the fragment of a Bible leaf. He read as he followed his team.

The summer had scarcely ended when the farmer's son was suddenly seized with a fatal disease. During the intervals of agony he was told his danger and was asked whether he was prepared to die. He assured his heart-broken parents that his peace was made with God. On the bed of death he declared what the Lord had done for his soul. That Bible leaf in the wind was guided by His hand who directs the sun. This flying scripture was an arrow out of Jehovah's quiver. From that soiled, tattered page, carelessly picked up by the wayside, spake the voice of the Lord to his slumbering soul. Conscience awoke. Sin, unknown or forgotten, revived. His guilty, burdened spirit, cried to God in secret places. The Lord heard the suppliant, and with the Bible, now his companion, pointed him to the Lamb who taketh away sin. In Jesus he hath found redemption through his blood and forgiveness of sins, according to the riches of his grace. And when death started up in his path and called him, with scarce a moment's notice, from the pursuit of the farm and the endearments of home away into eternity, he was possessed of an anchor sure and steadfast. That flying Bible leaf had taken hold of his heart, and linked his soul safely to the throne of God. [Presbyterian.

TRUE PHILOSOPHY.

I saw a pale mourner stand, bending over the tomb, and his tears fell fast and often. As he raised his humid eyes to heaven, he cried, "My brother! oh, my brother!"

A sage passed that way, and said, "For whom dost thou mourn?"

"One," replied he, "whom I did not sufficiently love while living; but whose inestimable worth I now feel!"

"What wouldst thou do, if he were restored to thee?"

The mourner replied, "that he would never offend him by any unkind word, but he would take every occasion to show his friendship, if he could but come back to his fond embrace."

"Then waste no time in useless grief," said the sage, "but if thou hast friends, go and cherish the living, remembering that they will die one day also."

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, April 22, 1852.

REFORMATION NEEDED.

As the annual meetings of our Associations draw near, we are troubled with some unpleasant forebodings. We fear that the communications from the several churches will show a lamentable coldness in piety, if not an important diminution of numbers. We fear that our benevolent enterprises will be found to have been poorly sustained. We fear that our brethren will be found to have been awfully guilty in not "seeking first the kingdom of God and his righteousness." We fear that it will be found, that they have attended first to their own comfort; practically saying, that they had their own affairs to look after, and God must wait. We fear that family prayer and prayer meetings will be found to have been sadly neglected. We fear that the "root of bitterness" will be found to have sprung up in some of our societies, troubling them, to the defilement of many. We fear that Sabbath profanation will be found to have prevailed to an alarming extent, and that the sanctuary and its ordinances have been despised. We fear that many of our ministers will be found to have "settled on their lees," and that that dangerous apathy prevails which is but the precursor of "terrible things in righteousness," to be sent upon us before our transgressions can be purged away. These are our forebodings, and we would that there was less ground for them than there is.

Already, we seem to hear the Head of the Church saying, "I have somewhat against thee, because thou hast left thy first love." Indeed, we know not but we are now undergoing the execution of that fearful sentence implied in the words, "Because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spew thee out of my mouth." What good reason can be assigned why this should not be our fate? The mere fact that we are the only people who stand forth as witnesses for God's holy Sabbath, is not a sufficient reason; for, however strict our conformity to his law in this respect, if we disgrace his cause in every other particular, he will not spare us on this account. Sabbath-keeping is not the whole of obedience, by any means; and if some practical proof is not given of its conduciveness to general piety, our zeal in contending for it does but render the institution itself contemptible in the eyes of those upon whom we would enforce it. It is a mistaken idea, which some fall into, that God will spare us for the sake of the Sabbath merely, dear as the institution may be to him. Were not the Jews God's chosen people? Was not the religion they professed God's truth? Was not the temple in which they worshiped God's house? Yet God could allow their enemies to triumph over them, and to profane the temple and its vessels, and to set up their abominations in the holy place; and all for the wickedness of them who had proved so recreant to his cause. With equal consistency may he give us up to be a reproach and a by-word among men.

But what does our zeal for the Sabbath itself amount to, after all? Lectures however numerous, and tracts however abundantly distributed, and controversies however earnestly prosecuted, will carry but little conviction to the public mind, while we ourselves are guilty of "holding the truth in unrighteousness." For, while many of us make the Sabbath a day of visiting and recreation, and others do not scruple to make it a day of traveling when it suits their convenience, and while all of us are guilty of practically forgetting that it is a day to be devoted wholly to God, "doing our own ways, and finding our own pleasure, and speaking our own words;" it were most unreasonable to count much upon the weight of our influence in behalf of the institution. The fact is, we have never properly fulfilled our mission in this respect. And that which is, above every thing else, called for, is reformation at home. We must keep the Sabbath better; we must give stronger evidence of our love for the institution; its conduciveness to our general piety and growth in grace must become more palpably evident to community, or else we may as well give up our mission, as unfit to be any longer engaged in it.

Seventh-day Baptists have indeed an important mission to fulfill in the earth; but alas! they are not ready. Must our annual gatherings, this year, only serve to render the humiliating fact more glaring? Must we, at our Associations and fall Anniversaries, be covered afresh with shame, when it shall stand forth, as though written with a pen of iron, that God has been summoning us to duty, and we were not ready? "Behold, these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig tree, and find none; cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground?" T. B. B.

DEATH OF ELD. JOB TYLER.—A letter from Clarke Needham, of Burroak, Mich., informs us of the death of Eld. Job Tyler, which occurred some time in February last, on board a vessel in which he was a passenger from Panama to San Francisco. The vessel was at the time near San Diego, and his remains were taken on shore and buried at that place. For many years past Bro. Tyler had resided at Oporto, St. Josephs Co., Mich., where there were only a few Sabbath-keepers, and his preaching was mostly among those who observe the first day. In consequence of spending much of his time in preaching, for which he received little or no compensation, and having a great amount of sickness in his family, he became embarrassed in his pecuniary circumstances; and to relieve himself, he concluded to spend a couple of years in California, in company with two of his sons. But his hopes of retrieving his fortune in that country, and securing means to preach the gospel unembarrassed on his return, have been thus sadly disappointed. He leaves a large family, and many sincere friends, to mourn his death. His age was about 55 years.

AMERICAN & FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.

The American and Foreign Bible Society (the institution organized by the Baptists at the time of their secession from the American Bible Society,) held a special meeting in New York on Fourth-day of last week, afternoon and evening. It was well attended, and the deliberations evinced a deep interest in the Bible cause, and a strong assurance that the operations of this Society are approved by the mass of the Baptist denomination.

An abstract of the Fifteenth Annual Report of the Board was presented, showing that $42,312 25 had been received during the year, of which $21,675 had been appropriated to the foreign field. It was also stated, that during the last sixteen years this Society has appropriated $240,460 for the distribution of the Scriptures in foreign lands.

But the special object of the meeting was to consider a notice from the First Baptist Church requesting the Society to vacate the rooms which they have occupied for several years in the meeting-house of that church. This subject was early taken up, and thoroughly canvassed. Some of the speakers indulged in severe censures upon the course of the church since the organization of the new-version society. The resolutions finally adopted on the subject are as follows:—

Whereas, The American and Foreign Bible Society has been notified to vacate the rooms No. 350 Broome-st., now occupied by them,

Resolved, That the Board be instructed to comply with the request at the time specified.

Resolved, That the Board be directed to procure suitable accommodations for the business of the Society.

In the course of the meeting, a plan was proposed for erecting in New York a building suited to accommodate the business of the Society. A committee of five, who had deliberated upon the matter, recommended the raising of $100,000 for the purpose, and intimated that they would give $1000 each to start with. A good deal was said about the importance of having a place in the Metropolis which Baptists could look to as their own, where all their business could be transacted, and where they could feel at home. The principal objection to undertaking the thing on a scale commensurate with the numbers and wealth of the Baptist denomination, seemed to be, that some of the denominational Societies are already located in other cities—as the Publication Society in Philadelphia, and the Foreign Mission Society in Boston. It was finally agreed to refer to a Committee the matter of raising funds and determining the plan of the proposed building.

The Society adjourned to meet at Cleveland, Ohio, on the 13th of May next.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Religious Liberty on the Continent—Popery—Public Funeral—Polytechnic Fire.

GLASGOW, April 2d, 1852.

More and more does the cloud lower upon the interests of religious liberty on the Continent of Europe. The liberty of the press, even, has been suspended in Germany, and the Chamber of Bremen dissolved. From Berlin there is intelligence of the seizure of "The Protestant," a religious journal, together with the suppression of a political paper. In our Parliament, it has been given as an explanation of the expulsion from Pesth of the English missionaries to the Jews, that it arose from a mistake of the Austrian Government; while our own Ministry, in reply to the petition of a large meeting held in Glasgow in behalf of those missionaries a fortnight ago, stated that the reason was that the Austrian Government does not wish any more of their Israelite subjects to become Christians. What then is to be expected in France, where six Popish Archbishops are Cardinals; and where, by the decree of Louis Napoleon, all the Cardinals are members of Senate? There has been a rumor here for several days, that M. Monod, Protestant minister in Paris for above thirty years past, and M. Roussell, known as a zealous minister also, have been ordered to leave France. Surely, Jehovah seems about to take peace from the church, as He has threatened to "take peace from the earth." But times of persecution have often been times of purification; and the issue, we trust, shall be to His glory, in a closer walk with God on the part of His people, and their nearer conformity to His revealed will.

In this country, Popery continues to make great efforts, and distinguished perverts, male and female, continue to join their ranks, led onward by Tractarian teachers in the bosom of the Church of England. The accessions to Popery are almost entirely confined to those of the higher classes, who have been so carried over; while it is not a little remarkable, that both in England and Ireland, (much more especially in the latter country,) far larger numbers have left the Church of Rome and joined the Protestant Church. Among these are a few who were priests. The reading of the Scriptures has been an eminent means of enlightening the minds of the Irish. But in the face of these facts, and notwithstanding of the confession to their truth by the priests on the spot, the Popish organs unblushingly put forth the most arrant falsehoods as to their numbers and progress. The Glasgow Free Press of last week asserts that more than half of the population of Glasgow is Popish. A more glaring falsehood never was circulated; for, we believe that an eighth part would be about the proportion of Papists to Protestants in this city. It is, however, far too large an instrument to be wrought by their priesthood without producing much mischief.

There was a public funeral in Glasgow this week—that of one who had long taken an active part in public matters—one who aimed at doing good in all things, and certainly effected it in not a few. Mr. Kettle was an elder of Dr. Chalmers' church when he was minister here. His views on baptism having undergone a change, he joined a Baptist church; and the zeal which he had manifested in the one denomination was continued in the other. He has for many years been conspicuous in the abstinence ranks, and was for a considerable time the editor of one of the organs of that body. He died of gastric fever. The Temperance League joined the funeral in a body.

There has been considerable interest manifested in this country in a recently patented discovery. It proposes to dispense with coal for domestic purposes, and it is asserted will be fully as economical, while it will do away with smoke, dust, ashes, and danger from sparks, and it can be produced at pleasure and regulated at will. It is called the British Polytechnic Fire, from the connection which one of the patentees has with the Polytechnic Institution in London. It consists in the burning of gas, produced by the decomposition of water, by passing steam over red-hot charcoal. This gas is made to pass through and amongst thin flakes of platinum, crumpled up and put into a common grate. These become red-hot on the gas being ignited, giving out great heat and the eye supposes it perceives a common good fire. It is proposed to establish a Company, and make the gas on a large scale. Platinum is chosen as being indestructible—although the cost of it for each grate will be not less than thirty shillings. J. A. BEGG.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST SETTLEMENT IN OREGON.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

No great enterprise is undertaken without a leading or controlling principle, equal in magnitude to the difficulties to be overcome; and none should be undertaken without a well-arranged system of present and future operations. Our Pilgrim Fathers, who founded a nation and a government unparalleled in the annals of history, for equal rights, and for civil and religious liberty, are often alluded to as patterns of enterprise and noble daring. So they were, and they had a principle to guide them equal to the undertaking. Deprived, in their own native land, of the priceless privilege of "freedom to worship God," they sought it under a foreign government; but, though relieved in some particulars, they were oppressed in others; and, like Noah's dove, they found no rest for their feet. But this sentiment was established, and burned inextinguishably in their bosoms, "Give us liberty, or give us death." At the price of every thing earthly, except liberty, they braved the danger of unknown seas, and planted a colony on an unknown and savage coast, not only at the risk of life, but at the cost of life itself. By hardships underwent, by famine and wars, a fearful breach was made in the number of those pioneers; but they found what they sought, and bequeathed it to posterity—freedom to worship God.

How is it with Seventh-day Baptists in proposing a new settlement on the shores of the Pacific ocean? Are they oppressed in their native land, so that they cannot enjoy religious privileges—the right to worship God as his word dictates? If so, is the evil to be avoided by a change of location under the same government, in a territory where the incipient steps are already taken to establish a government on the same principles, and in union with the States from which we remove?

It may be said, that by making early settlements we may participate in securing some privileges to Seventh-day Baptists in the organic laws. There is some plausibility in this view; but what great privilege is to be secured that is not enjoyed in most of the Northern States? In those States where certain privileges are denied practically to Seventh-day Baptists, they are, however, secured in the organic laws, and by faithful, persevering application, can be finally enjoyed; so that, although there may be something in the argument, it is not certain in its effect, nor vastly important in its consequences—not sufficient to induce the self-denial required by the separation from friends and established institutions of the Atlantic States.

To settle in a society sufficiently numerous to form a nucleus for after settlers, may be laudable, where enterprise impels persons to emigrate to far distant lands. Common interest for the perpetuity of the religion we profess, and the peculiarities we practice, would induce new settlers to situate themselves contiguously. But the perpetuity of the truths we profess is not the inciting cause of emigration to the north-west coast; for they are in no danger of annihilation in the old States, other than is threatened by our own inactivity and indifference; and the same cause will produce the same effect in Oregon. If new settlements are favorable to zeal in religious institutions, there is ample scope for religious enterprise on this side of the Rocky Mountains.

I am not opposed to Seventh-day Baptists settling in Oregon, or any other part of the world, if they have sufficient inducements; for the world is before us, and as citizens no one has a right to hinder or oppose us. Still, I am unable to discover an object, purely religious that should induce a few, say fifty or a hundred families, to separate themselves by a distance of half the diameter of the globe, and to endure the privations inevitable to new settlers, with consuming expenses, when all the advantages sought are enjoyed in their native land. The only valid argument, therefore, that I have seen urged, is based on the pecuniary advantages to be secured, in obtaining possessions in a new and wild country, which will advance in value, as the country advances in population and commercial pursuits. These may possibly be great; for the fortunate individuals who may possess themselves of such sites on the Pacific coast as very many on the Atlantic side have proved to be, will no doubt become wealthy after the lapse of half a century or more. But no sagacity is equal to the task of making a positive selection of the favored or fortunate spot; for changes in the developments of the country, and changes in business pursuits, may disappoint the best judges of present prospects. Notwithstanding the uncertainty attending all such speculations, they are as free and open to us as to any other portion of our fellow citizens; yet the propriety of attempting it in the name of Seventh-day Baptists is, in my opinion, very questionable, to say the least. It is not the fact, that Seventh-day Baptists have uniformly selected the poorer portions of the country, and necessarily remain poor. The fact doubtless is, that success has as often followed the enterprises of seventh-day people as any others. But the disadvantage they labor under, in the investment and employment of capital, has induced the wealthy to abandon the Sabbath, if not in the first, almost uniformly in the following generations; while the poor and less successful in the accumulation of wealth, have been under less temptation, and have maintained their integrity; and on that class, principally, is to be the dependence of the church for the perpetuity of this truth. The wealth of the church and society in Newport, in the early history of the country, has entirely flown, or has descended to posterity who have forgotten the faith of their ancestry; and so to a very great extent is the case with the western part of the State of Rhode Island, first settled, perhaps principally, by Sabbath-keepers. And though, to the honor of some it may be said, and through the influence of divine grace, some have retained wealth without abandoning the Sabbath cause, yet it cannot be said of a large majority of successful business or wealthy men of the present or late generations. The fact is, that not only in Rhode Island, but in all active business places, every where, the accumulated wealth of Sabbath-keepers has principally gone out of their hands in the second if not in the first generation, by apostasy from the Sabbath, leaving the societies and churches, as in primitive times, "poor in this world, (though, we trust,) rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom." As we suffer much inconvenience in carrying out our designs from poverty, we are inclined ever to congratulate our friends and brethren in their success in laudable enterprises, although it may be with trembling for the cause of truth they profess, as it proves so often a prelude to apostasy.

If this is a correct representation of the former, as of the present, experience of our churches, we have, as Seventh-day Baptists, but little interest in the success of business speculations among us. And should a colony of Sabbath-keepers, the choicest and noblest spirits of our denomination, go out and select the ground which should be destined for the site of the great Pacific mart and metropolis, and secure the control of millions, we might and doubtless would rejoice in and congratulate them on their success; still, as Sabbath-keepers, we should know from former experience, that it was fatal to the Sabbath cause among them; at most, after another generation. If this is not a correct representation, I shall doubtless be corrected; but until then, I shall regard all such enterprises, based on pecuniary advantages, as fatal, however pure the motives, to the Seventh-day Baptist cause, and not to be countenanced by the denomination. THE "FOREKNOWLEDGE" DISCUSSION.

For the Sabbath Recorder.

Perhaps, all things considered, it would be more conducive to harmony of feeling, and I trust not less so of sentiment, among those interested in the late discussion on "Foreknowledge," to resume it, that it may be brought to an issue less abrupt than that which now characterizes it. And that it may not occupy a place too prominent in the columns of the Recorder, I submit to the editor the following propositions:—

1. My article shall remain unreplied to one week.
2. The articles on each side shall be of nearly equal length. But—
3. This shall not so bind the respondent as to do injustice to his cause.

As heavy drafts are now made upon my time for duties in another direction, one or two weeks may elapse before I may be able to resume the question. N. V. HULL.

ALRED CENTRE, April 15, 1852.

Remarks.

We have already said, that "if our brother feels that justice has not been done him, or that the cause of truth requires some farther elucidation of his views, the door is open." To this we have nothing to add. Bro. H. will proceed according to his leisure; and if two, three, or more articles shall be necessary to complete what he has to say, he need feel himself under no restraint. It may be, that we shall make no reply till he is through, and we are not sure that we shall then. If withholding a reply for one week is necessary to do him justice, two weeks silence will be still better, and entire silence best of all. T. B. B.

REVIVAL AT BERLIN, WIS.

BERLIN, Wisconsin, April 1, 1851.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

I take this opportunity of informing you, and our brethren generally, that God has been pleased graciously to pour out his Spirit and revive his work in the Seventh-day Baptist Church in this place. The members of the church have been measurably awake to the obligations resting upon them to live to the glory of God, and labor for the salvation of souls. We have held evening meetings for about three weeks; and though it has been very bad weather most of the time, they have been well attended. Backsliders have returned, confessing their wanderings; sinners have been convicted of sin, and brought to Christ. Blessed be God, we have heard the shout of new-born souls, while they humbly lisp forth the praises of the Redeemer.

Last Sabbath, (March 27) I had the pleasure of baptizing nine willing converts, and receiving them to the fellowship of the church; two were added by letter. Others are expected soon; the work is yet going on, and it has been felt in all the surrounding country. Such a time I have never witnesed before during my residence in Wisconsin. Several of the converts are members of the Sabbath-School which has been in progress among us during the summer for two years past, and which we expect to continue. One man is a convert to the Sabbath. We feel greatly encouraged in view of God's goodness to us. "Cast thy bread upon the waters, for thou shalt find it after many days." Dear brethren, pray for us. JULIUS M. TODD.

QUERY.—Can the editors of the Recorder, or any of their correspondents, show that the following passages from the epistles do not effectually prove that no day, and especially the seventh, is now binding on any one, except so far as he may think it expedient—to observe either as a Sabbath as time of worship?

Rom. 14: 5—"One man esteemeth one day above another; another esteemeth every day."

Coll. 2: 16—"Let no man therefore judge you, in meat, or in drink, or in respect of an holy day, or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath," &c. SEARCHER.

Reply.

The Apostle, in the above-cited passages, evidently speaks of days which were constituted holy by the law of Moses. He who assumes that the weekly Sabbath was one of those days, begs the whole question. If Gen. 2: 2, 3 does not prove that the seventh day was constituted holy more than two thousand years before the law of Moses was given, it is impossible to prove any thing from the Bible. For our views of Col. 2: 16, 17, see a leading editorial in the Recorder of March 20, 1851.

BRIEF AND CONCLUSIVE.—Henry C. Wright, one of the Garrison school of Abolitionists, lately addressed a letter to Gerrit Smith, on the "Sin of Human Government." The following is Mr. Smith's reply:

HENRY C. WRIGHT—Dear Friend: I have just read your letter to me in the Liberator. I answer as many as I can of the letters addressed to me. But you, who know my burdens of business, will excuse me for giving my correspondent one line for his ten.

You scout civil government, and you hold the governing, restraining and punishing of men by men to be absurd and diabolical.

One hundred men put to sea in the same ship. They have scarcely left the shore ere two or three are detected in a plot to scuttle the ship, and escape in a boat with all the money. A meeting is promptly called, and the meeting makes a rule or passes a resolution, that if any are caught in the act of scuttling the ship, they shall be seized, and kept bound with rope or iron for the remainder of the voyage. To the question, whether such rule or resolution is morally right, what is your answer? If it is "yes," then you justify civil government. If it is "no," then the people will laugh at you, and you will laugh at yourself. Your friend, GERRIT SMITH.

POPERY AND REPUBLICANISM.—A card appeared in the Philadelphia Sun, of March 10, signed "Rev. John Dudam," the writer of which professes to be a Romish priest from Hungary, who has been dismissed from service in Lancaster, Pa., on account of his republicanism—especially for having "blessed" a banner which was given to Kossuth, for praying for the success of liberty and the downfall of despotism all over the world, and for visiting with Lutheran heretics. He says:—

"I am a Catholic priest, but I am a Hungarian, also, who, with his mother's milk, drank in the principles of freedom; who, though enslaved, never would consent to be made a mere tool of. I am one of the thousands of priests who fought in the ranks the battles of liberty; for the plurality of the Hungarian Catholic priests never can descend to be made hirelings of despotism, as the Roman Catholic preists do here in the United States. The Hungarian priests always considered themselves first as Hungarians, and as such they love liberty above everything else. The Roman Catholic priests here are congregated from all nations of the earth, because every despot sends here his creatures, for the purpose that these wolves in sheep's clothes may, as their missionaries, defend the interest of these despots."

THE SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST MEMORIAL.—The second number of the Memorial has been delayed in order to render more complete the biography of Eld. Thomas Hiscox. All of the matter is now the hands of the printer, and the number will be issued in the course of next week. It will contain a portrait of Eld. Thomas Hiscox; biographies of John Maxson, Sen., John Maxson, 2d, Joseph Maxson, and Thomas Hiscox; a continuation of the History of the Newport Church, including a full account of the settlement of Westerly, R. I.; Statistics of Seventh-day Baptist Churches, &c. &c.

NEW YORK LEGISLATURE.—The Legislature of New York adjourned on Sabbath morning, April 17th, at 6 o'clock, after a stormy all-night session. A very large number of Acts were passed at this session of the Legislature, but they were mostly of an unimportant character. Among the last Acts passed was one reducing the State Tax from half a mill to one quarter of a mill on the dollar, and another increasing the number of State Pupils in the N. Y. Institution for the Deaf and Dumb. The Senate appointed the State Engineer and the Chairman of its Railroad Committee (Mr. Bartlett) a Commission to investigate the subject of Railroad Accidents, and report a bill for their prevention at the next session. In the Assembly, during the last night of the session, Mr. Moss offered a resolution in favor of closing the canal locks and the public offices on Sunday, which was, after a good deal of manœuvering, passed by a vote of 35 to 31.

The following important bills were left unacted upon: The Senate Excise bill; the General Savings Bank; the Colleges Appropriations; the Building Societies; the Emigrant Passengers; the Taxation of Railroads; the extension of the Charter of the New York Institute for the Blind; the Anti-Rent "Stay;" the bill relating to Divorce; the Insurance bills; the disposition of the Chancery Funds; also of the unclaimed dividends and deposits in Savings Banks.

OREGON MISSIONS.—A statement has been going the rounds, on the authority of Rev. H. H. Spalding, to the effect that a treaty had been formed with the Indian tribes of the Middle District, Oregon, an article of which provides "that no American (i e., Protestant) Missionary, shall ever again enter their country." This statement is denied by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who says in a letter to President Fillmore:—

"I am reluctant to believe that Mr. Spalding has made the statement imputed to him, as it is entirely destitute of truth. There have been thirteen treaties negotiated with the Indians in Oregon by the Superintendent, the first dated August 5, the last November 6, 1851. All except the last bear the signature of Mr. Spalding himself, who was associated with the Superintendent in their negotiation. In no one of the whole number is there any provision whatever, that gives the slightest semblance of truth to Mr. Spalding's statement."

BAPTIST FOREIGN MISSION FUNDS.—It is stated by the officers of the Baptist Missionary Union, that the sum of $47,707 was received in the course of the month of March, making for the year, $99,000,—being upwards of $3,000 more than that of the year before. Living contributors have given $4,500 more than in the year ending March 31, 1851, which, with the amount to be received from other sources, will no doubt make out the $125,000 required to meet the responsibilities of the Board.

A BIBLE HOUSE IN ALABAMA.—The Southern Advocate says that the recent visit of the Rev. Dr. Styles, the Southern Secretary of the American Bible Society, to Montgomery, Alabama, has led to the purchase of a large house, in that city, to be used as a general depot for the Scriptures, to supply the wants of the people of that State. One gentleman subscribed the munificent sum of $15,000 toward the object, and the remainder, amounting to about the like sum, was subscribed by other gentlemen in Montgomery.

CORRECTED BIBLE.—The Record of the American Bible Society says: Inquiries are frequently made as to the time of issuing the Bible mentioned in the last Report, with the corrections of the "Committee on Versions." We will state, therefore, that the corrected edition has been stereotyped, and it is expected that it will be ready for delivery by the time of the annual meeting in May.

SWINDLING CALIFORNIANS.—California Ticket Swindling has been carried on largely in New York for a few months past, and nearly every week develops some new instance. Within the last ten days, complaints have been entered, and arrests made, of two companies, one of which is supposed to have realized some $50,000 by selling spurious tickets. The authorities seem disposed to investigate the matter thoroughly, and have either locked up the accused parties, or held them to bail in large sums.

ANOTHER SABBATH ACCIDENT.—On Sabbath (Saturday) afternoon, April 10, Edmund Furness, George Bunker, Mr. Burnham and son, and a man whose name is unknown, were drowned near Portsmouth, N. H., by the upsetting of a boat. Put this with the frightful list we published two weeks ago; and when one of the wise men tells you that Sunday must be the Sabbath because accidents so frequently happen to people who work and play on that day, just ask him to explain why so many people meet with accidents on the Saturday.

STILL ANOTHER SABBATH ACCIDENT.—Last Sabbath morning (Saturday, April 17,) a locomotive on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad exploded when near Harper's Ferry, instantly killing Thomas McMakin, an engineer on the road, and fatally injuring another engineer, and scalding the fireman and several others.

It is stated that on Second-day, April 12, there passed through New York city forty-one human chattels from the land of the slave-whip and coffle, on a pilgrimage to the North Star. They are now all safely landed in Canada, where they have ceased to be stray cattle and become men, women and children, no more to be subjects of the auction-block and brand.

ISAAC D. TITSWORTH requests his correspondents to address him at Plainfield, N. J., instead of Shiloh.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, APRIL 12.

To the Senate, the President sent in documents connected with the Japan Expedition. Mr. Borland made a complaint about the action of the Printing Committee and was excused from further serving on it. The French Spoliation bill was then taken up, and discussed till adjournment.

In the House, the Senate's amendment to the bill appropriating $500,000 for continuing work on the two wings of the Capitol, was concurred in. A great deal of time was spent in an ineffectual attempt to suspend the Rules of Order. Nothing else was done, except to refuse even to consider a proposition to adjourn on the 5th of July.

THIRD-DAY, APRIL 13.

In the Senate, the Capitol Enlargement bill was passed as it came from the House, without providing for the pay of the laborers while waiting for the slow movements of Congress. After some remarks about the precedence of bills, and the awkwardness of half-delivered speeches, Mr. Bell of Tennessee made a speech on Mr. Clarke's Non-Intervention Resolutions. He seems to think that a general war is approaching in Europe—a war unequaled in the world's history; and that we should prepare for it by making our country self-reliant and self-existent and self-protected, instead of sowing the seeds of division for mere party ends. Mr. Cooper took the floor, and the Senate adjourned.

The House spent the whole day in discussing the printing contracts.

FOURTH-DAY, APRIL 14.

In the Senate, the bill granting to the State of Ohio the unsold and unappropriated lands in that State, passed by a vote of 28 to 13. The French Spoliation bill was taken up, and upon it Mr. Felch finished his speech. Mr. Mangum took the floor, when the Senate adjourned.

The House was engaged in discussing the Printing Coalition, and a very violent debate followed; the actors being Messrs. Brown, of Miss., Polk, of Tenn., and Rantoul, of Mass. The subject was finally dropped, and the Homestead bill was taken up. Mr. Jenkins of New York made a speech against the bill, which adjourned the House.

FIFTH-DAY, APRIL 15.

In the Senate, after some unimportant business, Mr. Mangum made a long speech in explanation of his personal position with regard the the Presidential Election. The French Spoliations Bill was then taken up, and after some discussion was ordered engrossed.

The House spent the whole day in discusing the public printing question.

SIXTH-DAY, APRIL 16.

In the Seeate, Mr. Borland and others made personal explanations. After some time spent upon the question what business should have precedence, the Deficiency Bill was taken up, and Mr. Hunter made a long speech in explanation and advocacy of it. Several other persons remarked briefly upon the subject, and then the Senate adjourned till Second-day.

The House spent the whole day upon the Report of the Printing Committee, which was finally referred back to the Committee, and the House adjourned till Second-day.

European News.

The steamer America, with Liverpool dates to April 3d, one week later, arrived at Boston on the 16th.

Mr. Secretary Walpole had introduced the new Militia Bill in the British House of Commons. Its provisions aim at raising a force of eighty thousand strong—50,000 to be raised the first year by voluntary enlistment. The term of service to be five years, and the bounty £4 or £5 in one payment or by monthly installments. The time for discipline, &c., to be 21 days in each year, but power is given in case of emergency to increase it to seven weeks, or, on the contrary, to reduce it to three days. The estimated expense is £400,000 the first year, and £250,000 per annum afterward.

In the House of Lords, on the 2d inst., Lord Derby intimated that it was not the intention of Government to interfere with the Maynooth grant.

A numerous and influential meeting had been held at Lord Charmont's house, in Dublin, for the purpose of taking steps to erect, in Ireland, a suitable memorial in honor of the lamented poet, Moore.

The great event in Paris during the week preceding the sailing of the America, was the opening of the French Chambers, which took place on the 29th ult., the Prince-President performing the ceremony in person. He was attended by a brilliant staff of general officers, Colonels of Regiments, Counsellors of State, &c. His reception was of the warmest kind. He read his installation speech standing. In alluding to the foreign relations of France, he says, "It is for all our interests to keep with them the most amicable relations." He next proceeds to explain what his conduct will be in doing so. He disclaims any intention of declaring himself Emperor. But if the restless and disaffected portion of the community, by underhand intrigues, endeavor to sap the basis of his Government; if in their blindness they contest the legitimacy of the popular election, or endanger by their incessant attacks the future prosperity of the Ministry, then he would demand from the people, in the name of the repose of France, a new title, which would irrevocably fix upon his head the power they had invested him with.

An edict has been issued in Switzerland warning all foreigners who may be residing in the Canton of Geneva, without papers of Commission, that they will be certainly expelled unless they report themselves at the Police Office and obtain the necessary Carte de Sejoin; for those who quit voluntarily, passports chiefly for America or England would be given, but they were not allowed to go to either France or Germany.

Later advices from Bombay, &c., had been received by overland mail.

The negotiations with the Burmese having failed, and the insults being continued, a force of 6000 men in equal proportions from Calcutta and Madras was to set out for Burmah on the 13th March. A squadron of war steamers had left Bombay for Rangoon, and would call at Madras to transport the troops. Hostilities seemed inevitable. The forces under Sir Colin Campbell had reached Peshawaur.

The progress of the rebels in China was decided and unquestionable. The Governor-General of the Canton Province had been besieged in one of his own towns, and the remnant of the Imperial forces had been signally defeated.

Four Days Later.

The U. S. mail steamer Atlantic, with four days later European news, arrived at New York on Sunday last.

By this arrival we have intelligence of the total loss of Her Majesty's steamer Birkenhead, on the 26th of February, near Simon's Bay, by striking a rock. She had on board 476 soldiers and 15 officers, bound for the Cape of Good Hope; of whom 349 soldiers and 9 officers perished. The entire loss, including crew, was 446 persons.

Prince Felix Lewis John Frederic Schwarzenberg, Prime Minister of Austria, died of apoplexy, at Vienna, on Monday, the 2d instant, in the 53d year of his age. The Tribune says that he is responsible for all the gloomy catalogue of crimes of which Haynau was the zealous executor. It was virtually by his authority that the thirteen Generals were executed at Arad in violation of the terms implied at their surrender. He put to death the gallant and generous Louis Batthyanyi, a deed that even his apologists do not attempt to justify. He dictated the measures of treachery and of severity that have rendered Hungary a waste of desolation, and re-established the overthrown despotism of the Hapsburgs. He framed the lying Constitution of March 4, 1849, and annulled it when its purpose was accomplished. Instead of the forms of liberty then promised, he has established a centralized despotism far more pervading, harsh and burdensome than that of Metternich. He has restored the Imperial House of Austria, but only to render its downfall certain and entire hereafter.

The Kaffir War is not over, nor is there any prospect of its speedy conclusion.

Emile Girardin, the most brilliant journalist in Paris, who was banished after the 2d of Dec., has again assumed the chief editorial care of Prsese, and has published his inaugural.

Mr. Henry Grinnell, of New York, has been unanimously elected an honorary member of the Geographical Society.

The Patrie, Paris paper, states that two Envoys Extraordinary from England and France are about to visit Brazil and La Plata, the object of their mission being to open to the commerce of the world the river La Plata and its tributary streams, the Parana and the Uruguay.

The Paris Moniteur contains a decree ordering the construction of an edifice on the system of the Crystal Palace, in the great square of the Champs Elysees, destined to receive the National Exhibiton, and capable of serving for public ceremonies and civil and military fetes.

Ten thousand troops are at present employed between Mecca and Akaba, clearing the great Hadj road of marauders by which it has of late been infested, and forts along the line are being built for the protection of caravans.

Tienteh's (Chief of the China rebels) proclamations are now openly shown in Canton, and bulletins of imaginary victories gained by the Imperial troops are no longer put forth by the Canton authorities. The Governor-General (Seu) of the Canton province is besieged by the rebels in one of his own towns, and the remnant of the Imperial forces have lately been signally defeated. The only hope of the Matchoo dynasty lies in the chance of dissension arising among the rebel leaders, an event by no means improbable.

The Japan Expedition.

There has been considerable speculation about the Japan Expedition, and doubts whether it would be carried out have been expressed in some quarters. But on the 12th inst., the President sent to the Senate sundry documents relating thereto, which put to rest all questions of this kind. The following is an extract from the letter of President Fillmore to the Emperor of Japan:—

"I send you this letter by an Envoy of my own appointment, an officer of high rank in his country, who is no missionary of religion. He goes by my command, to bear to you my greeting and good wishes, and to promote friendship and commerce between the two countries.

"You know that the United States of America now extend from sea to sea; that the great countries of Oregon and California are parts of the United States; and that from these countries, which are rich in gold and silver and precious stones, our steamers can reach the shores of your happy land in less than twenty days.

"Many of our ships will now pass in every year, and some perhaps in every week, between California and China; these ships must pass along the coast of your Empire; storms and winds may cause them to be wrecked on your shores, and we ask and expect from your friendship and your greatness, kindness for our men and protection for our property. We wish that our people may be permitted to trade with your people, but we shall not authorize them to break any law of your Empire.

"Our object is friendly commercial intercourse, and nothing more. You may have productions which we should be glad to buy, and we have productions which might suit your people.

"Your Empire contains a great abundance of coal; this is an article which our steamers, in going from California to China, must use. They would be glad that a harbor in your Empire should be appointed to which coal might be brought, and where they might always be able to purchase it.

"In many other respects, commerce between your Empire and our country would be useful to both. Let us consider well what new interests may arise from these recent events, which have brought our two countries so near together; and what purposes of friendly amity and intercourse this ought to inspire in the hearts of those who govern both countries."

A Philadelphia letter, dated April 12, says: A colored woman, aged 25 years, named Mary Douglass, was found dead, in Bedford-st., this morning. Cause—starvation, and want of medical attendance.

California News.

Two weeks later news from California, and about a million dollars in gold dust, has come to hand since our last.

The most important part of the news is the great freshet in the interior caused by the late rains, the loss of property, and the incidents connected with it. The loss of property, however, is not as great as it was on a former occasion last year. Sacramento was overflown in consequence of a crevasse in the levee, and so was Marysville. In the former comparatively little damage was done, because the inhabitants were to a certain extent prepared for an inundation, and as the waters rose and gained on them, they removed their property to more elevated positions. They therefore suffered more inconvenience than actual loss. Marysville, on the other hand, suffered a great deal. The damage is estimated at $150,000. But the greatest loss was sustained by the farmers on the low lands, and by the owners of bridges leading to the mines.

A report from Shasta had been received at San Francisco, the substance of which was, that a boy was killed in the neighborhood, supposed to have been done by the Indians. Thereupon a company was formed who went out and killed thirty Indians.

Onion Valley, it appears, was recently the scene of the execution of five Indians, who were found guilty of the murder of one American, and the wounding of another.

From the 28th of February to the 10th of March, inclusive, the number of passengers arrived in San Francisco by sea, was 1,424—of whom 1,250 were men, 133 women, and 41 children.

From the Isthmus, we learn that passenger cars now run regularly on the Panama Railroad as far as Buena Vista, to which point it was opened on the 2d inst., and the Chief Engineer expects to have the road opened to Triola on the 18th inst., leaving only twelve miles of river navigation. Passengers leaving Aspinwall in the morning arrive at Gorgona the same day. Fare on cars, $5; from the end of the Road to Gorgona, in boats, from $1 50 to $3; while by the old river route from two to four days were consumed, at an expense pecuniarily of from $10 to $15. The road is in excellent order and the cars are equal in comfort to any on our northern roads.

It is said that much distress prevails among the North America's passengers at Acapulco, many of them being destitute of means and dependent on the gifts of passing steamers for the means of living. Most of the ladies were taken on board the Pacific Mail Steamship Panama, but the balance have no means, either present or prospective, of getting away, as the owners of the North America have no extra ships to send to their relief.

In a list of passengers who died on board the bark Cabargo, on the passage from Panama to San Francisco, we notice the name of S. D. Maxon.

Burning of Hong Kong.

The San Francisco Tribune of March 3d says that the bark Wm. Watson arrived at that port on the previous day, 60 days from Hong Kong, bringing intelligence of a most disastrous conflagration in that city. Nearly all the city is consumed. Hundreds of lives have been lost. Every newspaper office has been destroyed. The fire occurred on the 26th December, and commenced in the China Bazaar. It spread with fearful rapidity among the bamboo houses of the Chinese, and soon communicated to the finest part of the city, becoming perfectly resistless. The loss of life among the Chinese was dreadful. The number that perished had not been ascertained. One Colonel of an English regiment lost his life in the attempt to blow up a building and arrest the flames. Also a Lieutenant belonging to H. B. M. ship Hastings was killed by the falling timbers of a house which had been blown up. A Sergeant of sappers and miners met a similar fate. The public market was destroyed, and much suffering was experienced for a few days after the fire. The Governer and Sir Wm. Bowman had convoked the Council, and among other provisions adopted for the public welfare, was one forbidding the construction of bamboo houses. The Chinese houses were to be built of stone, or of the material used in the construction of the Victerine Roods.

SUMMARY.

A terrible fight occurred near the City of Havana on the 7th, between the English and American sailors. Quite a formidable number of them were arrayed on both sides. They fought desperately with knives, pistols, bludgeons, stones and other missiles. Several were killed on both sides, and many badly wounded. So desperate had they become that the authorities found it necessary to call out the military to preserve order and quell the disturbance. At the latest accounts peace had been restored and many of the offenders arrested and imprisoned for trial.

Very dangerous counterfeits of the one, two and three dollar notes of the Bank of Albany have just made their appearance. The bills are undoubtedly impressions from the genuine plate, but the signatures of the Register, President, and Acting Cashier, are forgeries. They bear date of January, 1852, and purport to be signed by E. Westerlo and H. Boyd as Register, John Townsend, Presipent, and Andrew White, A. Cashier.

The Special Committee of the Massachusetts Senate on the subject of Capital Punishment, have reported a bill altering the existing law in relation to the punishment of death, though not abolishing the death penalty. It provides that no person under sentence of death shall be executed within one year of the time of his sentence, and not then unless a warrant is issued by the Governor.

We learn from the Huntsville (Texas) Item, that a disease, resembling the Asiatic cholera, broke out in the vicinity of that place about three weeks ago, and was very fatal in several familes. Col. John Hume lost thirteen of his negroes, and a son about seven years old. There were eight corpses on his premises at one time.

The Supreme Court at Washington on Tuesday decided the case of the Clamorgan grant, under which half a million of acres of land were claimed in the State of Arkansas. The decision is in favor of the Government, and against the validity of the claim. The large tract of country covered by it, therefore, falls into the mass of the public lands, and is subject to sale and settlement.

The steamboats Robert Rogers and Republic, came in collision in the Cumberland River, on Thursday, and the former sunk almost immediately, giving the passengers and crew barely time to save themselves. It is believed no lives were lost. Mr. Merritt, a returned Californian, had $16,000 in gold dust in his trunk, which he had taken from his state room to the deck, and when the boat careened, it was thrown into the river, and lost.

The engine No. 100, on the Erie Railroad, collapsed a flue on Tuesday evening, near Chester, instantly killing the fireman, and seriously if not fatally scalding the engineman. The engine was nearly new, and was considered one of the best on the road. The explosion was probably caused by the neglect of the engineman, in allowing the water to get too low in the boiler.

The overflow of the rivers of Texas has at length subsided, after having extended to the bottoms of most of the rivers from their heads to near the Gulf. As a compensation for the loss, it appears that the fields which were overflowed have been enriched by the deposit of about a foot of new soil.

Advices from Port-au-Prince to March 28 have been received. The most extensive preparations continued to be made for the coronation of the Emperor, Faustin the 1st, which was to take place on the 11th of April. All business was to be suspended from eight to fifteen days after the coronation.

The official statement by the officers of the Suffolk Bank shows the amount of the defalcation of Brewer and Rand (the late Receiving Teller and Bookkeeper) to be $214,000. The surplus fund of the Bank to meet deficiences is $300,000. The amount taken by Brewer and Rand was mostly lost in stock speculations in New York.

From present appearances, the number of emigrants who will sail for Liberia the coming season will be unprecedentedly large. Over twenty from Pennsylvania have applied for a passage to the New York State Society, and as many more from New Jersey have secured a passage in the packet from Baltimore, of May 1.

On Saturday, April 10, twenty students of the Sophomore class were expelled from Yale College. They were members of the Kappa Sigma Theta (secret) Society, which had recently issued a publication in which a member of the Faculty was held up to ridicule.

S. Knapp, Chamberlain of this City, acknowledges the receipt of a letter signed "Contrite," inclosing one hundred and fifty dollars, which the writer says belongs to the City, and which he wrongfully appropriated. The same has been credited to the City as requested.

A land slide occurred on the Troy and Rutland Railroad near Granville, Washington County, on Thursday, April 8, instantly killing three men, and carrying away a large portion of the track, and with it a locomotive and a train of dirt cars.

The Maine Liquor bill passed the Massachusetts House of Representatives, April 13, by 93 majority, with nearly all the amendments passed in committee of the whole, and with another amendment, postponing its operation for sixty days from and after its passage.

The Assembly of New York passed a very important bill, on the 13th inst. It provides that all moneys without owners in Banks, Savings Banks, or in the Chancery Funds, shall be used to promote Common School Education.

In the Pennsylvania Legislature, the bill for the abolishment of the death penalty, and substituting imprisonment of not less than fifteen or more than fifty years in lieu thereof, passed finally in the House, on Thursday, April 8: Yeas, 46; Nays, 42.

A man at Cadysville, near Plattsburgh, N. Y. writes that on the 8th inst., the snow was still from one to three feet deep in the woods; for fifty years he has not seen so hard a winter; they have had 150 days sleighing.

A dispatch dated Buffalo, Saturday, April 17, 1852, says: We have had a heavy fall of rain here, and the ice is now going fast down the Niagara River. The prospects are good for the opening of navigation in three or four days.

A semi-monthly line of steamers will commence plying between New Orleans and San Juan de Nicaragua on the 1st of June. It will consist of the steamers Daniel Webster, now of the line between New York and San Juan, and the Pampero.

Capt. Thomson, of the steamer Yacht, was capsized in a boat, and lost three of his men, on the bar at Brazos Santiago, a few days since, in attempting to sound the water in the channel.

The constitutionality of the Canal Enlargement Act of last summer has been fully argued, before the Court of Appeals, which will render judgment thereon at a special term to be held at Albany on the second Tuesday (11th) of May.

St. John's (N. B.) papers of the 5th inst., mention that a numerous expedition is fitting out there for the gold region of Australia, and that a similar movement is on foot at Halifax, N. S.

Captain Dixey, late of the bark Missouri, who was lately convicted of stealing a large sum of money in specie from his vessel, was sentenced to five years' confinement in Dedham jail.

On Sixth-day last, Kossuth and suite, accompanied by Senator Seward and several others, visited Mt. Vernon. On the following day Kossuth came on through Philadelphia to Burlington, N. J., where he spent Sunday.

In Voluntown, Ct., on the 4th inst., by Eld. C M. Lewis, Mr. Wait R. Worden, of Russia, N. Y., to Miss Mary Crandall, of Hopkinton, R. I.

In Hartsville, N. Y., April 12th, by Eld. H. P. Burdick, Mr. Horatio Pope to Miss Angeline Potter.

In Berlin, Wis., Oct. 13th, 1851, by Eld. J. M. Todd, Mr. Norman Clarke to Miss Miriam Davis, all of Berlin.

In Berlin, by the same, Jan. 1st, 1852, Mr. Orlando Harraw to Miss Arzelia C. Burdick, all of the above place.

DIED,

In Hartsville, N. Y., April 2d, 1852, at the residence of her son, Silas Palmiter, Mrs. Sally Palmiter, in the 87th year of her age. She was born in the State of Connecticut, where she became hopefully pious at an early day. During the sane part of her life, she ever manifested a strong attachment to the cause of Christ. She was a worthy member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hartsville at the time of her death. In 1828 sister P. became insane, and was as much so as could well be imagined until 1837, when some of her Christian friends met at her son's residence, where she then was, and fasting, spent the day in praying God that her reason might be restored. During the meeting, she remained in her usual standing attitude, until they were about to close, when unexpectedly (as "Peter was at the gate") she clapped her glad hands, shouted "Glory to God," exhorted them to continue in prayer, saying, "Deliverance is come," prayed with them, soon became perfectly sane, and remained so until within a few days of her departure, as we humbly trust, to that world where there is no distracted vision. H. P. B.

At the residence of his brother-in-law, Daniel Rogers, near New Brooklyn, N. J., April 5th, Isaac Lewis Titsworth, son of A. D. Titsworth, aged 22 years. Brother Titsworth embraced religion seven years since, and became a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Plainfield, N. J. Soon after that he went to Pawcatuck, R. I., where he lived a few years. After returning, his health began to fail, though not so as to cause any alarm until about a year ago, when it was apparent that the consumption had marked him for its prey. He continued his business until August last, when he was compelled to retire and wait for the coming of death. About a week before his death, he went to his brother-in-law's to spend a few days, and before his departure from there death came; but it found him with his armor on: he was not surprised, nor alarmed, but quietly and anxiously waited the coming of his Lord to take him to himself, being confident that he was ready, knowing in whom he had believed, and in whom he had put his everlasting trust. He left a young widow, and numerous relatives, to mourn their loss, which is his everlasting gain. W. B. G.

At Alfred Center, N. Y., April 15th, in full hope of a blessed immortality, Ann, widow of Eld. Orson Campbell, in the 44th year of her age. "The righteous hath hope in his death."

In Berlin, Wis., Dec. 16th, 1851, Mr. William Davids, aged fifty-four years. The deceased was formerly from Woodbridgetown, Penn., thence he removed to Ohio, and then to Milton, Wis. At the commencement of the settlement in Berlin, he removed here, where it was his delight to encourage the people of God, and warn sinners. The Saviour's smiles dispelled the gloom, and smoothed his passage to the tomb. His funeral was numerously attended, and a discourse preached from 1 Thess. 4: 18. He leaves a wife and children to mourn his death. J. M. T.

At Dakota, Waushara Co., Wis., Feb. 8th, 1852, Mrs. Thorngate, wife of George Thorngate. The deceased formerly lived in Persia, N. Y., and was an exemplary member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in that place. She maintained her integrity toward her Saviour to the end of her pilgrimage, though severely tried by a long and distressing illness, (dropsy.) The writer visited her a few weeks before her death, when she conversed freely about the change that awaited her, made her own arrangements for her funeral with great composure of mind, and when the time of her departure came, she fell asleep in Jesus. She was beloved by all in life, and her loss is deeply felt by the little society in Dakota. J. M. T.

In Berlin, Wis., April 2d, 1852, of lung fever, Deacon John T. Edwards, aged 38 years. Brother E. removed from Hopkinton, R. I., to this place last fall, and though he lived so short a time among us, yet he was beloved by all, on account of his steadfast attachment to the cause of Christ. He endured great bodily suffering with Christian fortitude and resignation to the will of God. He leaves a wife and five small children to mourn his loss. J. M. T.

In Shiloh, N. J., 3d mo. 27, sister Lucy West, wife of Mr. Richard R. West, in the 40th year of her age. During her Christian course she gave evidence of having a treasure in heaven. So sudden was her departure, that she had time only to bid her husband and children an affectionate farewell, when her spirit took its everlasting flight to regions of bliss. "Be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh."

In Shiloh, 4th mo. 1, brother Lewis Davis, aged 66. During a pilgrimage of many years, he evinced a growing interest for the welfare of Zion. His life showed his profession to be real. In his last sickness he regretted much that he had not been more ardent and active in his Master's cause. Sensible for weeks before his death that he should not recover, his chief concern was to exercise strong faith in the Saviour. "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."

In Shiloh, 4th mo. 2, sister Eunice S. Davis, wife of Dea. Enoch J. Davis, aged 36. The words of the departed were few, but her life was a witness to the truth of religion, and has left the evidence that her hope in Christ was an anchor to the soul both sure and steadfast. Her last sickness was protracted and severe. She bore her sufferings with Christian fortitude and resignation. She even longed to depart and be with Christ, which is far better. She selected for her funeral the 1006th and 1008th hymns, and Psalm 23: 4—"Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me."

At Nile, Allegany Co., N. Y., very suddenly, March 31st, 1852, Mrs. Sally Brown, wife of Noah K. Brown, aged 40 years.

In Hopkinton, R. I., April 9th, 1852, Mr. Daniel Coon, son of Mr. Isaac Coon, deceased, aged 32 years. He was resigned to death, and expressed a hope that he was going to be with Christ.

In Hope Valley, R. I., on the 12th inst., of disease of the brain, Rebecca Viola, only child of George R. and Lucy E. Lanphear, aged one year.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

The Forest Trees.

BY ELIZA COOK.

Up with your heads, ye sylvan lords,
Wave proudly in the breeze,
For our cradle bands and coffin boards
Must come from the forest trees.

We bless you for your summer shade,
When our weak limbs fail and tire;
Our thanks are due for your winter aid,
When we pile the bright log fire.

O! where would be our rule on the seas,
And the fame of our sailor band,
Were it not for the oak and cloud-crowned pine,
That sprung on the quiet land?

When the ribs and the mast of the good ship live,
And weather the gale with ease,
Take his glass from the tar who will not give
A health to the forest trees.

Ye lend to life its earliest joy,
And wait on its latest page;
In the circling hoop for the rosy boy,
And the easy chair for age.

The old man totters on his way,
With footsteps short and slow,
But without the stick for his help and stay,
Not a yard's length could he go.

The hazel twig in the stripling's hand,
Hath magic power to please;
And the trusty staff and slender wand
Are plucked from the forest trees.

The Aztecs.

The Northern papers for some time past have contained frequent notices of two diminutive specimens of the human race, known as the Aztec children. They are chiefly remarkable for their extremely small size, their general intelligence, and the fact of their being pure specimens of that race, once powerful, but now degenerate, which centuries ago ruled in the country of the Montezumas. It is stated that these children belong to an order dedicated to sacerdotal service, and that they were procured from a secluded and hitherto unknown Aztec city in Central America, at great expense, and even peril of life, to their adventurous protector. Many persons have expressed decided skepticism as to the truth of the story, and declare that it is fabricated for purposes of mere speculation, while others yield implicit credence to it. Without seeing and examining these interesting people for ourselves, we, of course, cannot venture to express a decided opinion as to their genealogy; but it is undoubtedly true that many circumstances related by antiquarians and travelers in Central America tend to corroborate the story. Almost all the inhabitants of that country agree in declaring the existence of a large city situated among almost inaccessible mountains, isolated from communication with the outer world, and which not more than one or two white men have ever succeeded in reaching. Stephens, in his valuable work on Yucatan, we believe, alludes to this subject, and seems to place reliance in the statement. Within the last month we have accidentally been placed in possession of facts which confirm us in our belief of the truth of these stories; and though we are not sufficiently versed in Aztec lore to enter into a minute description, we will endeavor to give a brief explanation for the benefit of those who take an interest in such subjects.

About three weeks since, a gentleman, who had recently returned from Tehauntepec, placed in our hands a volume composed of a number of layers of parchment, bound together with brazen clasps, and presenting appearances of great antiquity. It was obtained from an Indian curate—there are many such in that part of Mexico—and the history of it, as related by himself, is this: He said that he had purchased it from a native trader, who once a year was in the habit of visiting a city among the mountains, toward the south, which is inhabited exclusively by Aztecs. The name of this city is Coaxchencingo, which, in the language of the tribe to which the curate belongs, signifies "the mystery of the mountains." Within an inner apartment of the grand temple of Coaxchencingo are kept about fifty volumes similar in appearance to the one referred to, which, it is said by the priests, were preserved from the extensive collection of records known to have existed in Mexico at the time of the conquest, and which were destroyed by Cortez in the heat of his intemperate zeal against the paganism of the Aztecs. The volumes preserved at Coaxchencingo are regarded as holy things, and are only to be seen on days of great public rejoicing or solemnity. It was on an occasion of this kind that the Indian trader succeeded in abstracting one of them.

This volume, which we have now before us, is filled with hieroglyphic characters, almost all of which are, of course, perfectly unintelligible to us. But one circumstance connected with it is of the highest importance, and tends to confirm the theory that the Aztecs are descendants of a race which migrated to this continent from the eastern shores of Asia, about twenty centuries ago. It is remarkable that on one or two pages of the volume, immediately beneath the hieroglyphics, there are insriptions in Greek characters, forming words in that language, but written backwards, in the Oriental style. On the first page, these Greek inscriptions runs thus: [we give English characters for want of Greek,] not nap not sogol, which, reversed, reads, O' logos ton panton—literally, "word of all," or "of all things." It is to be presumed from this, that the book is a history of the mysterious people among whom it was found, and could it be thoroughly deciphered, it would, no doubt, completely solve the problems of our aboriginal archæology. On another page there is a picture of water, and under it the word, "sessalaht," which is evidently "thalasses," Greek for the sea. A representation of a vessel full of men accompanies this, and conveys the impression that it refers to a voyage or migration from beyond the sea.

The existence of these Greek words in this volume is a very singular circumstance, and proves conclusively that it must have been the work of some nation from the old continent which held sufficient communication with Greece to learn the language. That it is Asiatic, is proved by the fact of the reversed writing, which method is used by all Oriental nations. A coincident fact with this one is the discovery lately made of a Hebrew volume found in the possession of a western tribe of Indians, an account of which has already been given in almost all the newspapers, and will be doubtless remembered by our readers. To what nation the authors of this Aztec volume belonged, is yet a mystery, though the facts would seem to indicate a Jewish origin; for although there are no Hebrew characters in the book, the known fact of the disappearance of the twelve tribes, the many similarities between the customs, rites and ceremonies of the Aztecs and those of the ancient Jews, and other circumstances of the same nature, lend plausibility to the theory of a Hebrew origin.

The elders and priests among the Jews were well acquainted with Greek; in fact, it was the polite language of that era, and it is not surprising that, with a certain affectation of erudition, they should have made use of it in their writings. However, this is a point which we leave to those more learned than we are to decide. We may remark, nevertheless, en passant, that the physiognomy of the Aztec children, as described by the Northern papers, is essentially Jewish. We understand that it is the intention of the proprietor of the strange volume referred to, to submit it to the inspection of Professor Gliddon, whose hieroglyphic attainments may enable him to make some interesting discoveries in this new field of investigation.

The Brewster Branch of the Mormons.

The Illinois Journal gives the particulars of the condition of the Brewster branch of the Mormon Church. It appears that over fifteen years ago, a family by the name of Brewster came to Springfield, Ill. They were Mormons, and had a weakly boy of unusual talents. At twelve he wrote very well, and remembered all he read. At this time the Mormons professed to speak in unknown tongues, and to have revelations from Heaven. The boy gave scope to his day dreams, and conceived that he was inspired to write out the lost Book of Esdras. A hundred or more pages were prepared. They foretold the establishment of a Church on a different basis from that of the Mormons, its emigration to the mouth of the Colorado, its establishment and flourishing condition there, and gave rules for its government. The divine character of these revelations by young Brewster was believed in by a considerable body of people scattered over Illinois, Iowa, and Ohio.

The Journal states that the arrangements for some time in progress for the emigration of the Church were so far completed in July, a year ago, that some forty families met at Independence, Missouri, and took up their line of march for the Colorado, near its mouth. Before their arrival at Santa Fé, the company divided, and the whole of the largest division, under the direction of a Mr. Goodale, perished by starvation and the hands of the savages on the Gila. Brewster and his party stopped on the Rio Grande, some distance below Santa Fé, and endeavored to make a settlement there, having discovered that they could do so under a new explanation of the prophecy of the Book of Esdras. The Journal has a letter from Sorocco, the stopping place of Brewster and his party, dated January 26th, 1852, stating that sickness, starvation, and the savages, have about used up the balance of these misguided people. The few left would return to the States, if they had the means to get back.

Oregon—Interesting Letter.

Many in the West are now looking to Oregon as a future home, and the tide of immigration thither this season will be much increased over past years. Parties are organizing, or have already started, from Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, and Missouri, and our exchanges note that the spirit of immigration and adventure is not confined in all instances to the young and middle-aged, but Western pioneers of threescore are making the five months' journey to obtain "more elbow room." The Indiana State Journal notices the departure, of several families from Indianapolis, with ox and mule trains, and says the Oregon immigration is beyond any thing we have experienced in this vicinity.

Correct and reliable information in regard to Oregon is very desirable, especially to such as contemplate removing to the Pacific, and we take great pleasure in publishing the following letter from Hon. Anson Dart, Superintendent of Indian Affairs for Oregon. Mr. D. formerly resided in Wisconsin; and few men are so well qualified to judge of a new country, or to form and express an intelligent, sound, and reliable opinion from actual observation. Although not written for the press, the letter imparts information of such general interest touching the flourishing young territory, that we have taken the liberty to make it public:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 23, 1852.

DEAR SIR,—There has been forwarded to me from Oregon, the letter of E. H. Thayer, Esq., with yours attached, asking questions relative to Oregon.

I regret, extremely, that my time is so much taken up while in this city that I cannot go as much into detail on this subject as I otherwise would be inclined to do, as I have good reason to believe that there are but few white men living that have seen as much of Oregon as I have.

It was believed when I left, that there would, within one year, be inhabitants enough to entitle Oregon to become a State. Steps have already been taken to this end.

Oregon, spoken of as a whole, is an open prairie country, without timber. Still, all that part of it lying West of the Cascade mountains is perhaps three-fourths of it covered thickly with timber, growing very tall and straight; it is mostly a species of fir. There is much white cedar; some yellow pine; no white pine.

The soil is very good for wheat and other grains—corn excepted—as well as for fruit of every kind that will grow in a Northern climate.

The prospects for the farmers in Oregon are better than in any other portion of country with which I am acquainted. In short, labor of every kind commands high prices. There are, nevertheless, many that are idle in the towns, such as doctors, lawyers, clerks, speculators, and gamblers. Talented lawyers, however, are doing well.

The mercantile business is every where overdone—large quantities of goods sold at auction in San Francisco, California, are daily shipped to Oregon, and there sold for less, in many cases, than the same could be bought for in New York. Besides this, large cargoes of goods are sent there by Eastern shippers, and sold at ruinous losses to the owners. As soon as the merchants of Oregon are permitted to order the goods that are wanted in the country, then, and not till then, will a healthy state of things exist, connected with merchandise.

The lumber business is of immense value to Oregon. Say to your friend from Maine, that persons well acquainted with saw mills, who are willing to work, will all do well there. The water power of Oregon is immense—it is greater, I think, than that of any State in the Union. On the large streams, however, it is very expensive using it, on account of the great rise and fall in those streams in the rainy and dry seasons. The present number of saw mills in Oregon is about one hundred.

There are no first rate flouring mills, although there are one or two that cost enough to be good.

Large quantities of flour and potatoes are sent to California from Oregon, as well as immense numbers of hogs and poultry; besides, butter and eggs are items in their exports.

The climate of Oregon is more mild than any other part of the United States in the same latitude. There was no snow or freezing weather last Winter. The grass was green all Winter, and cattle were in better condition in the Spring than in the Fall before; and this, too, without food, except grass. Hundreds of thousands of horses are raised in upper Oregon, without ever tasting any other food except grass.

My time will not allow me to go into further detail, only to say that the cost of going to Oregon is considerable, either in time or money. It takes about five months to go by land, and about forty days by the steamers—first cabin passage costs about five hundred dollars—steerage about three hundred.

The mail steamers go once in two weeks from San Francisco to Oregon and back.

I have the honor to remain,
Your ob't servant, ANSON DART,
Superintendent Indian Affairs for Oregon.
J. A. HARRIS, Cleveland, Ohio.

Progress of the Americans.

An English journalist, speaking of the unexampled growth of the United States in all the elements of national prosperity, sums up in this wise:—

"In an interval of little more than half a century, it appears that this extraordinary people have increased above 500 per cent. in numbers, their national revenue has augmented nearly 700 per cent., while their public expenditure has increased little more than 400 per cent. The prodigious extension of their commerce is indicated by an increase of nearly 500 per cent. in their imports and exports, and 600 per cent. in their shipping. The increased activity of their internal communications is expounded by the number of their post-offices, which has been increased more than a hundred fold, the extent of their post-roads, which has been increased thirty-six fold, and the cost of their post-office, which has been augmented in a seventy-two fold ratio. The augmentation of their machinery of public instruction is indicated by the extent of their public libraries, which have increased in thirty-two fold ratio, and by the creation of school libraries, amounting to 2,000,000 volumes.

"They have completed a system of canal navigation, which, placed in a continuous line, would extend from London to Calcutta, and a system of railways which, continuously extended, would stretch from London to Van Diemen's Land, and have provided locomotive machinery by which that distance would be traveled over in three weeks, at the cost of 1½d. per mile. They have created a system of inland navigation, the aggregate tonnage of which is probably not inferior in amount to the collective inland tonnage of all the countries in the world, and they possess many hundreds of river steamers, which impart to the roads of water the marvellous celerity of roads of iron. They have, in fine, constructed lines of electric telegraph which, laid continuously, would extend over a space longer by 3,000 miles than the distance from the north to the south pole, and have provided apparatus of transmission by which a message of 300 words, dispatched under such circumstances from the north pole, might be delivered in writing at the south pole in one minute, and by which, consequently, an answer of equal length might be sent back to the north pole in an equal interval. These are social and commercial phenomena for which it would be vain to seak a parallel in the past history of the human race."

Profits of Farming.

The New York State Agricultural Society are in the habit of awarding, at their annual meetings, premiums for the most successful management of farms. In 1850, the second of these premiums, a silver cup, valued at thirty dollars, was taken by Daniel T. D. Moore, Esq., of Watervleit, Albany county. The written statement of his operations, made under oath, is very full and interesting. His success is enough to make the old-fashioned farmers fairly open their eyes with astonishment, and shows what skill and energy and perseverance may accomplish. He is growing rich on the same land where others had become poor.

His farm consists of one hundred and eighty-five acres, situated upon the light sandy soil near Albany. For fifty years before it came into his possession, it had been under lease, and for a portion of that time in the market. The tenants held it only from year to year, and consequently had no incentives to make improvements. Each one worked it upon the principle of realizing the greatest profit at the least expense. Under this system of exhaustion, it became so reduced that the last tenant considered it no longer worth the rent of a hundred dollars, for the whole yearly sales of produce were only worth about four times that amount. The buildings and fences were in a ruinous condition; the few fruit trees were old and diseased; and a good part of the premises were allowed to run to waste.

Mr. Moore purchased in opposition to the advice of his friends, and in November, 1845, he took possession. He was unprepared to pay down the whole of the purchase money, so that he has been obliged to pay as interest more than the former occupant had paid as rent. The dwelling-house he sold for fifty dollars, but the barn was worth so little that he tore it down. He then erected comfortable and substantial buildings, and commenced enclosing the tract with post and board fence. In five years' time he has succeeded in rendering the soil as fertile and productive as the very best in his vicinity, and, as we have seen above, has taken a premium from the State Society for his good management. The total receipts, in 1850, amounted to over four thousand eight hundred dollars; and the profits, after deducting the farm and family expenses, exceed twenty-six hundred dollars!

Such an instance of success should be known over the whole country. Farming is often looked upon as a poor business, not adapted to persons of intelligence and enterprise. Young men flock to the city in crowds, in the hope of bettering their condition; while those who remain under the paternal roof never take an interest in their occupation, and are content with a mere subsistence. Those who fail in farming would probably fail in other and "more respectable" pursuits; but many that make capital farmers, would prove poor merchants. Commerce is a gigantic lottery, where at least ninety-five out of a hundred draw blanks; the prizes are magnificent, but they are few in number. The soil is a faithful servant, which will restore the five talents, with other five which they have gained. Its rewards are slow, but sure; it gives a living to all, and to skill, forethought, and iron-hearted industry, and unflinching perseverance, it offers a competence—moderate, yet sufficient. Let the farmer possess the secret of success—good management—and he need never complain of ill luck, or grumble at the caprices of fortune. [Am. Cour.

More than was Asked For.

A singular trial has grown out of a spiritual communication, made through a couple of mediums who lighted down in the town of New Berlin, Chenango County, and offered their services in transmitting dispatches to and from the spirit world. A gentleman who sought their good offices, in company with several others, required to be told of the condition of his deceased paternal ancestor, and the answer was given that his father was quite happy in the sphere beyond, and felt no regret at parting with the outer world; for in his mundane existence he had suffered cruel treatment at the hands of his son, (the questioner,) who had beaten and chained him and practiced other afflicting indignities upon him. The gentleman denied the harsh impeachment, declared himself slandered, and sought redress at the hands of the Courts, by bringing an action of libel, not against his "father's spirit," but upon the offending mediums, who had either too faithfully transmitted the message or meddled in a matter too delicate for their attention. The case is still pending; but the Chenango Telegraph says there are reports that the testimony elicited at the primary investigation rather tended to confirm the offensive dispatch. The mediums were held to bail to answer the charge of libel.

Trouble among the Rappites at Economy.

A case of considerable interest has just been decided by Judges Grier and Irwin in the Circuit Court of the Western District of Pennsylvania. The plaintiff was Joshua Nachtrieb, and the defendants the Trustees and Elders of the Rappite Society of Communists established at Economy. The Society was first organized in Butler Co., Penn., in 1805, by George Rapp and his associates; in 1814 they removed to Harmony, Ind.; in 1823 they returned to Pennsylvania and founded Economy. By their articles of agreement, revised for the last time in 1836, each member renounces all personal property in the possession of the Society, and covenants that in case of withdrawal of membership, he will claim nothing as wages or profits or as his by any manner of right, and that it shall be left altogether to the discretion of the Superintendent whether to give him any thing as a donation, or not.

It seems, however, that in 1832 a difficulty took place in the Society, and a portion of its members seceded. They received from George Rapp, the Superintendent, $105,000, as a consideration for their part of their common property, and withdrew to a place in the vicinity called Philipsburg. With some of these parties Joshua Nachtrieb, the plaintiff in the trial, had had some intercourse. In consequence, he was expelled by George Rapp in June, 1846, but before leaving signed a paper stating that he had withdrawn, and had received from Rapp $200 as a donation, according to the contract, with $10 for traveling expenses. The Judges decide that the evidence on the trial proved this to be but a formality, and that though no physical violence was used in his ejection, he was virtually compelled to go by Rapp's commands, whose authority the members were used to obey.

The Court also held, that as the articles of agreement do not lay down what offenses should be punished by expulsion, nor establish any tribunal to decide on such offences and to decree expulsion and forfeiture of all share in the property, such expulsion and such forfeiture cannot be enforced in the present case against Nachtrieb. Accordingly it is ordered that an account be taken of all the property of the Society in the year 1846, when the plaintiff left, as in the year 1819, when he joined, and of the number of persons entitled to membership at each period; an estimate is also to be made of the fair value of the plaintiff's labor during the 27 years that he was attached to the Society, deducting all money paid and other property taken by him at the time of his expulsion. Whether Nachtrieb is entitled to a share of the whole property or only to a share of the profits while he was a member, or to a mere compensation for his services during that time, are questions reserved for a future decision of the Court.

The property of the Society at the present time has been estimated at $8,000,000, but we presume this is exaggerated. [Tribune.

Transplanting Trees.

In taking up trees for transplanting, a regard should always be had to their size, and a due proportion should be preserved between the size of the tree and the amount of root attached. A deficiency of root may be partially, but not wholly, compensated by a diminution or entire removal of the top, but there should always be root enough to supply nourishment to the body, (which, if large, requires the more to sustain it,) and top enough to digest it. A deficiency of top, however, is less fatal, especially in the early part of the season, than a deficiency of root; for if there be enough of the latter, the tree will readily make enough of the former as fast as it shall be needed; but if there be a deficiency of root, although the tree may live and even grow for a time on account of its innate, vital energies, yet it will probably die before the close of the season.

It is for this reason that many trees that "start well" are often found to die in the latter part of the summer, notwithstanding all other circumstances seem to favor their preservation. It is a mistake to suppose that if a tree once begins to grow all risk is at an end. The first season will not always decide; for if that should be peculiarly favorable, a small root may sustain a tree through it, but the consequence of a small root may be a correspondingly small top, and of both, a dead strip running the whole length of the tree, occupying, perhaps, one-third or one-half of its whole circumference. Some trees have a much greater tenacity of life than others, and hence may grow with a much smaller root, or even with none at all. But with these exceptions there should always be a direct proportion between the size of a tree and its root, and an inverse proportion between the root and the tenacity of life, i. e. the less the tenacity of life, the greater should be the root.

Origin of Newspapers.

Mankind are indebted to the wisdom of Queen Elizabeth, and the prudence of Burleigh, for the first printed newspaper. It was entitled the "English Mercurie," and was, by authority, imprinted at London by her highness' printer, 1588. The earliest number is preserved in the British Museum Library, dated July 23d, in that year, and contains the usual intelligence, given after the fashion of the London Gazette of the present day. In these Mercuries we meet with advertisements of books, and they differ not very much from the announcements of our own time. During the civil wars, periodical papers, the champions of the two parties, became generally circulated, and were edited by writers of ability. Among the principal we may notice Marchmont Needham, Sir John Birkenhead, and Sir Robert L'Estrange. At the restoration, the proceedings of Parliament were interdicted to be published, unless by authority; and the first daily paper after the revolution took the popular title of the Orange Intelligencer. In the reign of Queen Anne, there was but one daily paper, the Daily Courant. The first provincial journal in England was the Orange Postman, started in 1706, at the price of a penny, "but a halfpenny not refused." The earliest Scottish newspaper made its appearance under the auspices of Cromwell, in 1552.

Beggars in Paris.

A Paris correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune says that a great number of beggars have for some time past occupied a large house in the quarter de la Pépinière, and have formed among themselves a "Fraternal Association" for duping the public. Some went into the streets, and pretended to be laboring under severe infirmities; others hired children and passed them off as their own; others visited respectable people in their own houses; an Englishwoman specially confined her labors to the English and American community; a degraded ecclesiastic victimized the clergy; and some of the band remained at home to manufacture begging letters and petitions, as well as to forge the certificates necessary for their success. There was a complete wardrobe attached to the establishment, where the rogues costumed themselves anew every morning to elude suspicion and simulate a vast variety of characters. The money which was collected, amounting to a considerable sum daily, was carried to a common fund, out of which the house was kept. Every evening the whole band dined together in good style, and, it seems, amused themselves in drinking toasts to their dupes. The police recently put an end to their operations, by arresting the whole of them just as they were about to sit down to dinner. They were carried off to the Prefecture of Police.

The Custody of Children in Pennsylvania.

In the Court of Common Pleas, Philadelphia, April 12, Judge Kelly delivered an opinion in a case argued a few weeks since in which the mother of a child, now 9 years of age, desired to take the custody of it from her sister, the aunt of the child.

Judge Kelly held, that the aunt was entitled to the child's custody, because, when the child was an infant, he was delivered to the aunt by the mother, on account of her inability to support him. The aunt nursed him at the same breast with her own child, and he had never known another mother than his aunt, and he called her mother, and her children his brothers and sisters.

The mother of the child had lived in the neighborhood where he resided, and had not kept up that intercourse between a parent and child that she should have done, if she intended at a future day to lay claim to him. The child did not know her as his mother, nor had she ever given him so to understand; and now, after the lapse of 9 years, when she has become married again, and desired to repossess the child, he could not think of severing the ties which so closely bound him to his aunt, and the aunt to him, unless the law required it.

He quoted largely from legal authorities, to show that the proper custodian was the aunt, who had stepped in, at the instance of the mother, and taken her place toward the child. The Judge then asked the child, to show that he was not under restraint, with whom he would go? He replied, "with his mother (the aunt.) He wanted to go home to his brother and sister," (his cousins.) The Judge then gave the custody to the aunt.

TO EUROPE IN FIVE DAYS.—The authorities of Newfoundland have granted to H. B. Tibbatts and associates, of this City, the exclusive right to construct and use the magnetic telegraph across that island for the period of thirty years. This telegraph line is to terminate at St. Johns, about 48 miles being submarine; hence from St. Johns to Galway, in Ireland, is 1,647 miles, which an ocean steamer, such as the Baltic or Pacific, can make in five days. The telegraph line from Galway to London is to be completed this year; so that by a good line of steamers between St. Johns and Galway, the merchant of New York and the merchant of London come together by one-half the present distance in point of time; and with facilities for passengers to St. Johns, one-half the term of sea-sickness, and the chances of marine disasters, cease instantly. MYSTERIES OF A FOOT MEASURE.—The odd-looking sliding scale with which cordwainers determine the extent of our understanding, and which seems to measure neither feet nor inches, is explained in "size" thus: A size is the length of one "barley corn," or one-third of an inch. A size-stick is thus formed: Take a rule or piece of pine wood, thirteen inches in length and divided into thirty nine equal parts, of one-third of an inch each. The first thirteen are left blank and counted nothing. The second thirteen are called children's sizes. The third thirteen are called men's and women's sizes, each marked from one to thirteen. Thus nine inches is a man's size, No. 1; ten inches is No. 4; eleven inches No. 7; and twelve inches No. 10.

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—

The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one or two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term. Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00
Monochromatic Painting	3 00
Oil Painting,	5 00
Writing and Stationery,	0 50
Vocal Music, Elementary,	1 00

EVIL PRACTICES OF YOUTH.

It is a propensity of the youthful mind ever to be busy. Ennui seems to be unendurable. If one kind of business is not at hand, children will invariably find something else to engage their attention; and such is the tendency of the human mind to evil, that, in most cases, left to themselves, they will choose what tends to degrade, what plants the seeds of evil in a fertile soil, where, in after life, will be gathered a most ample harvest of sin, misery, and moral death. I will endeavor to point out to parents a few of the germs of sin, hoping that I may turn the attention of some to this subject, believing as I do, that many parents do not properly appreciate it.

In the first place, I shall notice the gambling propensity, which is quite often manifested in children at an early age. The first development of this vice is engaging in playing "fox and geese," "twelve-men morris," "pins," and games of kindred nature. "But these are trivial matters," says one; "what hurt can it do a child to engage in these innocent pastimes? He is a foolish man who condemns them; it is not gambling." But stop a moment, friend; let us look at this a little. Gambling is playing at some game for some stake. Now, it matters not whether this stake be money or something else; the principle is the same. The child who plays at these games feels a pleasure when he is successful, and his opponent feels a contrary emotion. This pleasure, then, becomes the stake, and those who play for it are as much gamblers as those who play for money. This principle applies as well to all other games as to these childish games. The next step is "checkers," "back-gammon," "chess," "quoits," &c., prepared by the arch-gamblers for a more advanced age. The child, well trained in the nursery to the first, is now prepared for this next step. A few months in this department is usually sufficient to prepare the youth for the third step—the card table for diversion. Through these three steps parents and guardians often accompany their charge, and then are filled with horror and anguish that their children should of themselves take the fourth and last step necessary for becoming confirmed gamblers; that is, playing for money. This step is very easily taken, and parents should not wonder, if they encourage or permit the first steps, that their children do become gamblers. It is no matter of wonder. They were gamblers from the first game of "pins," or "fox and geese," they were indulged in. The germ only wanted cultivation in order to produce accomplished blacklegs. Their parents, when they learned them or permitted them to play their first childish game, were gamblers.

It may be urged, that but a small portion of those, who, in early life, are permitted to engage in these games, ever become confirmed gamblers. This may be true; yet it does not militate against the argument. If such children do not sin, it is because they lack opportunity, or means for indulging the appetite. Ask nine tenths of the gamesters of our country how they became so, and they will tell you, that these scions were early engrafted into their natures by indulgence or direct instruction. A young man from New England, trained by his parents to sober habits in all other respects, but allowed and taught to engage in social games of whist in his mother's parlor, started on visit to his sister's in Kentucky, carrying a package of considerable value to her, and was decoyed into a den of gamblers on the way, and fleeced of every cent of his money, and the contents of the package, together with his watch. This rendered him desperate, and, ashamed to meet his sister, he went on to the South, became involved in crimes of a deeper dye, as is usually the case with professional gamblers, and finally died of the prison fever in a penitentiary of Louisiana, thus bringing disgrace and sorrow upon his family. This has been the case with thousands, and will continue to be so until parents are awake to this subject.

There are young men in our denomination, members of the church, who frequent the shops and oyster saloons, too often the pest of society, which are found in almost every little village that specks the country, and play "checkers" and "back-gammon" hours at a time, and with those, too, who, in other company, are professional gamblers; and yet these members remain, so far as I can learn, in good standing with the church. This is sober truth, and it ought to afford a lesson, not only to parents, but also to the church at large. There are those, too, members of the church, who keep checker boards and other implements for similar games in their shops, or rent rooms to those who do keep them, for the purpose of indulging this propensity in the multitudes of customers who resort thither. I ask such persons, Is this right? Do you not act the part of "corrupters of youth?" And can you expect to escape their punishment? If you expect it, you build your hopes upon a slender foundation. I ask the church, Is this as it should be? Ought not the church to look after such members? Let the candid answer, and act accordingly. MATHETES.

THE JEWS IN PALESTINE.

(June 17.) This morning at six o'clock we attended the Hebrew service in the Mission-house. Mr. Nicolayson read the Liturgy in Hebrew, in a very beautiful manner, Mr. Bergheim, Simeon, and ourselves responding. It was truly interesting to hear the holy tongue made use of in believing prayer in the name of Jesus. The greater part of this day was devoted to making up our journals, and writing letters to Scotland.

In the afternoon, we visited the Castle of David, the only stronghold now remaining upon Mount Zion. It is a little to the south of the Jaffa Gate, and overhangs the vale of Gihon. The lower part of one of the towers is evidently of great antiquity. The stones are very large, and beveled in their edges, and we were told that it is perfectly solid. This is believed to be the tower of Hippicus, said by Josephus to be one mass, and which was spared by Titus when the temple and city were destroyed. May it not be still more ancient, the site at least of "the stronghold of Zion" which David took from the Jebusites? Or "the tower of David," to which the neck of the Church is compared, "Thy neck is like the tower of David builded for an armory?" Descending into the vale of Hinnom, we tried to sketch the steep view of Mount Zion; then returning, gathered severel specimens of the Spina Christi. This plant, called Nabka by the Arabs, grows abundantly on the hills of Jerusalem; the branches are very pliable, so as easily to be platted into a crown, while the thorns are very many and sharp, and about an inch in length. The tradition seems highly probable, that this was the plant of which the Roman soldiers platted a crown of throns for the brow of Christ.

Towards evening, we visited that part of the Old Temple wall to which the Jews are allowed to go, that they may pray and weep over the glory that is departed. It is a part of the western enclosure of the Haram, and the access to it is by narrow and lonely streets. The Jew who was our guide, on approaching the massy stones, took off his shoes and kissed the wall.

Every Friday evening, when the Jewish Sabbath begins, some Jews may be found here deeply engaged in prayer; for they believe that prayer still goes up with most acceptance before God, when breathed through the crevices of that building of which Jehovah said, "Mine eyes and my heart shall be there perpetually." This custom they have maintained for centuries, realizing the prophetic words of Jeremiah, "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? Behold, and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, which is done unto me, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted me in the day of his fierce anger." We counted ten courses of these massy stones, one above another. One of them measured fifteen feet long by three broad; another was eight feet square; others farther south were twenty-four feet long. They are beveled like the immense stones of the mosque at Hebron, and are of a very white limestone, resembling marble. Some of them are worn smooth with the tears and kisses of the men of Israel. Above the large stones, the wall is built up with others smaller and more irregular, and is evidently of a modern date, affording a complete contrast to the ancient building below.

Later in the evening, Mr. M'Cheyne went to visit the same spot, guided by Mr. George Dalton. On the way, they passed the houses where the lepers live all together, to the east of the Zion Gate within the walls. A little farther on, the heaps of rubbish on Mount Zion, surmounted by prickly pear, were so great, that at one point they stood higher than the city wall. The view of Mount Olivet from this point is very beautiful. The dome of the mosque El Aksa appeared to be torn and decayed in some places, and even that of the Mosque of Omar seemed far from being splendid. Going along by the ancient valley of the Tyropœon, and passing the gate called by the monks the Dung Gate, now shut up, Mr. Dalton pointed out in the wall of the Haram, near the south-west corner, the singular traces of an ancient arch, which Professor Robinson had discovered to be the remains of the bridge from the temple to Mount Zion, mentioned frequently by Josephus, and remarkable as a work of the highest antiquity. The stones in the temple wall, that form the spring of this ancient bridge, are of enormous size. This interesting discovery goes to prove that the large beveled stones, which form the foundation of the present enclosure of the Haram in so many parts, are really the work of Jewish hands, and the remains of the outer wall of the temple of Solomon. Neither is this conclusion in the least contradictory to the prophecy of our Lord, "There shall not be left here one stone upon another that shall not be thrown down," for these dreadful words were spoken in reference to the temple itself, which was "adorned with goodly stones and gifts;" and they have been fearfully fulfilled to the very letter, for the Mosque of Omar, entirely a Moslem building, stands upon the rock of Moriah, probably on the very spot where the temple stood.

The Jewish place of wailing is a little to the north of this ancient bridge. Here they found a young Jew sitting on the ground. His turban, of a greyish color peculiar to the Jews here, shaded a pale and thoughtful countenance. His prayer-book was open before him, and he seemed deeply engaged. Mr. Dalton acting as interpreter, he was asked what it was he was reading. He showed the book, and it happened to be the 22d Psalm. Struck by this providence, Mr. M'Cheyne read aloud till he came to the 16th verse, "They pierced my hands and my feet;" and then asked, "Of whom speaketh the prophet thus?" The Jew answered, "Of David and all his afflictions." "But David's hands and feet were not pierced!" The Jew shook his head. The true interpretation was then pointed out to him, that David was a prophet and wrote these things of Immanuel, who died for the remission of the sins of many. He made the sign with the lip which Easterns make to show that they despise what you are saying. "Well, then, do you know the way of forgiveness of which David speaks in the 32d Psalm?" The Jew shook his head again. For here is the grand error of the Jewish mind, "The way of peace they have not known."

The same evening we visited all the synagogues of Jerusalem, at the time of evening prayer. They are six in number, all of them small and poorly furnished, and four of them under one roof. The lamps are the only handsome ornaments they contain. The reading-desk is little else than an elevated part of the floor, enclosed with a wooden railing. The ark has none of the rich embroidery that distinguishes it in European synagogues. As it was an ordinary week-day, we found in every synagogue the Jewish children who had been receiving instruction in reading; and in one of the largest, a group by themselves was pointed out to us as being orphan children who are taught free. After examining the synagogues, we paid a visit to a Rabbi, whose house, like that of Justus, "joined hard to the synagogue." We walked with him upon the roof, looking down upon the city. The roof had a railing or battlement, as commanded in the law, "Thou shalt make a battlement for thy roof." There are thirty-six yishvioth, or reading-rooms, for the study of the Law in the Holy City. In one of these, close by, some old men were busy at evening prayer. The evening prayers in general seemed not to be well attended. Our guide, who was a Jew, on coming to his own synagogue, immediately left us and went up to the front of the ark, praying very devoutly, but with much ostentation. We were much impressed with the melancholy aspect of the Jews in Jerusalem. The meanness of their dress, their pale faces, and timid expression, all seem to betoken great wretchedness. They are evidently much poorer than the Jews of Hebron; and "the crown is fallen from their heads; woe unto them that they have sinned."

At night we had another opportunity of obtaining information as to the experience of Missionaries in laboring among the Jews of Palestine. The principal subject of conversation was—the literary qualifications of missionaries for Palestine. The Hebrew is the most necessary language for one who labors among the Jews in this country, and it is spoken chiefly in the Spanish way. A Missionary should study the character and elements of Arabic in his own country, and the more thoroughly he is master of these the better, but the true pronunciation can be acquired only on the spot. Yet Arabic is not so absoulutely necessary as Hebrew. Spanish, too, is useful, and also German, and he must know Italian, for the purpose of holding intercourse with Europeans in general. Judeo-Spanish is the language of the Sephardim, and Judeo-Polish of Ashkenazim (i. e. Jews from Europe.) All of them know a little of Italian. All Jews in Palestine also speak Hebrew, but then they often attach a meaning to the words that is not the true meaning or the grammatical sense, so that it is absolutely necessary to know the vernacular tongue, in order to be sure that you and they understand the same thing by the words employed. A Missionary ought to be well-grounded in prophecy, and he should be one who fully and thoroughly adopts the principles of literal interpretation, both in order to give him hope and perseverance, and in order to fit him for reasoning with Jews. It is not so much preaching talents as controversial that are required; yet it is to be hoped that both may soon be needed. He ought to have an acquaintance with Hebrew literature to the extent of understanding the Talmud, so as to be able to set aside its opinions. Acquaintance, too, with the Cabbala is necessary, in order to know the sources of Jewish ideas, and how scriptural arguments are likely to affect their minds. Zohar is one of the best Cabbalistic commentaries. A knowledge of Caldee and Syriac would also be found very useful. In a mission to the Jews there ought to be both Jewish and Gentile laborers; the Gentile to form the nucleus, the other to be the effective laborers. If a converted Jew go through a course of education, and be ordained, he would combine the advantages of both; still a Gentile fellow-laborer would always be desirable. Faith and perseverance are the grand requisites in a missionary to Israel. He should never abandon a station unless in the case of absolute necessity. He may make occasional tours in the country round about, but he must have a center of influence. It is of the highest importance to retain his converts beside him, and form them into a church; for two reasons:—1. Little is done if a man is only convinced or even converted, unless he is also trained up in the ways of the Gospel. 2. The influence of sincere converts belonging to a mission is very great. It commends the cause of Christ to others. At the same time it ought, if possible, to be made a rule to give no support to converts, except in return for labor, either literary or agricultural.

AN EFFECTIVE SERMON.

The Vermont Chronicle gives the following curious account of the fruits of a sermon on practical morality:—

"A brother in the ministry took occasion to preach on the passage in Luke 16: 10—'He that is unjust in the least, is unjust also in much.' The theme was, 'that men who take advantage in small things of others, have the very element of character to wrong the community and individuals in great things, where the prospect of escaping detection or censure is as little to be dreaded.' The preacher exposed the various ways by which people wrong others; such as borrowing; mistake in making change; by errors in accounts; by escaping taxes and custom-house duties; managing to escape postage; finding articles and never seeking owners, &c.

"A lady the next day met her pastor, and said, 'I have been up to Mr. ——, to rectify an error he made in giving me change a few weeks ago, for I felt bitterly your reproof yesterday.' Another individual went to Boston to pay for an article not in her bill, which she noticed was not charged when she paid it. A man going home from church remarked, 'I do not believe there was a man in the meeting-house to-day, who did not feel condemned.' After applying the sermon to a score or more of his acquaintances, he continued 'Did not the pastor utter something about finding a pair of wheels?' 'Believe not, neighbor A. He spoke of keeping little things, which had been found.' 'Well, I thought two or three times he said something about finding a pair of wheels and really supposed he meant me. I found a pair down in my lot a while ago.' 'Do you,' said his companion, 'know who they belong to?' 'Mr. B—— lost them a short time ago.' The owner was soon in possession of his wheels."

ANGEL CHARLIE.

BY MRS. EMILY C. JUDSON.

He came—a beauteous vision—
Then vanished from my sight,
His cherub wing scarce cleaving
The blackness of my night;
My glad ear caught its rustle—
Then sweeping by he stole
The dew-drop that his coming
Had cherished in my soul.

Oh! he had been my solace
When grief my spirit swayed,
And on his fragile being
Had tender hopes been stayed.
Where thought, where feeling lingered,
His form was sure to glide,
And in the lone night watches
'Twas ever by my side.

He came—but as the blossom,
Its petals closes up,
And hides them from the tempest,
Within its sheltered cup.
So he his spirit gathered,
Back to his frightened breast,
And passed from earth's grim threshold
To be the Saviour's guest.

My boy—ah! me, the sweetness,
The anguish of that word—
My boy, when in strange night dreams
My slumbering soul is stirred,
When music floats around me,
When soft lips touch my brow,
And whisper gentle greetings,
Oh, tell me, is it thou?

I know by one sweet token
My Charlie is not dead,
One golden clue he left me,
And on his track he sped.
Were he some gem or blossom,
But fashioned for to-day,
My love would slowly perish,
With his dissolving clay.

Oh, by this deathless yearning,
Which is not idly given,
By the delicious nearness
My spirit feels to Heaven.
By dreams that throng my night-sleep,
By visions of the day,
By whispers when I'm erring,
By promptings when I pray.

I know this life so cherished
Which sprang beneath my heart
Which formed of my own being
So beautiful a part;
This precious winsome creature,
My unfledged, voiceless dove,
Lifts now a seraph's pinion,
And warbles lays of love.

Oh, I would not recall thee,
My glorious angel boy,
Thou needest not my bosom,
Rare bird of life and joy,
Here dash I down the tear-drops
Still gathering in my eyes,
Blest—oh! how blest! in adding
A seraph to the skies.

From the American Messenger.

THE YOUNG HUSBAND AND WIFE.

A few years since, a young merchant, with his accomplished and beautiful wife, located himself on one of the frontiers of our country. He was educated for a Catholic priest, but the providence of God hedged up his way to that profession, and he entered on mercantile business, in which he was very successful. His wife, also, had always lived with Roman Catholics, and though her friends mingled in the higher classes of society, and had free intercourse with Protestants, yet in their religious views they were bigoted.

The lot of this young and interesting couple, in their new location, was cast in the vicinity of a missionary station, and their politeness and acquaintance with the forms of society led them to treat the missionaries with kindness and attention. Thus they lived for some time, each enjoying their own religious views. The system of colportage was not then known in name, but the missionaries were tract distributers, and scattered the precious messages of love and mercy wherever they went. One of them was returning a call to these Catholic friends, and left on the table the tract of Baxter, entitled, "Heaven Lost." It lay some time untouched, but at last, to while away a lonely hour, this young and interesting woman took it up, and the persual awakened a new train of reflections. She saw and felt that the course she was pursuing endangered her eternal happiness, and this led to a conviction that she was a sinner in the sight of God, and needed something more than the forms of Catholic worship to change her vile nature, and fit her to dwell in the presence of infinite purity.

But what should she do? She feared to tell her husband her feelings, for he had ridiculed the practice of the missionaries in thus scattering their books. She dared not go to the missionaries for instruction, for that would expose her not only to the disapprobation of her husband, but also to the anathemas of her own church; and this she considered an evil next in degree to that of the displeasure of God. Struggling with these feelings, and her heart ready to burst with a sense of its own vileness, she one night retired to her bed before her husband came in from his business.

After a while he entered the house, and going into the room where she was tossing on her sleepless pillow, he opened the book-case, and that same tract fell from off one of the shelves. He had before several times thrown it aside, and now taking it up, vexatiously remarked, "I can go no where but what I must be tormented with this tract; but, I'll be troubled with it no longer—I'll burn it." He caught it up impatiently, and was about putting his threat into execution, when his wife ventured to say, "I would read it first, Samuel." Influenced partly by politeness to the friend who had left it, and partly by complaisance to the wife whom he loved as his own soul, he turned, seated himself at his desk, and began to persue it. Although his position at the desk was such that his wife could not see his countenance, yet she watched his movements with almost breathless anxiety, and soon perceived he was devoting himself with earnestness to its contents.

He soon inquired, "Have you read this, Maria?" She tremblingly answered that she had. He became more and more absorbed, and at last said, with much apparent solemnity, "Maria, I don't believe you have read this attentively; shall I read it to you?" She assented; and he, changing his position, turned to the commencement of the tract, and began reading it aloud. As he proceeded, anxiety was manifest in his countenance, his voice grew tremulous, and as the fear of his disapprobation was swept from her mind, her own bursting heart found vent in sobs and tears. Thus they proceeded through the whole tract, and when the last page was finished, he was not only convinced of sin, but of the inefficacy of his false hopes to relieve his burdened soul, and was ready to unite with her in inquiring the way of deliverance.

But they knew not what to do. Neither of them had ever offered a prayer to God through the Saviour who died for sinners. Neither of them knew any thing of the Bible, which will direct the inquiring soul aright; and that night was spent in such agony as can scarcely be conceived by a mind which has been instructed in the way of salvation. The morning dawned, but thick darkness reigned in that dwelling; and before the middle of the day their inward agony had so conquered not only their pride, but their fear of Catholic anathemas, that they unitedly ordered their carriage, and were taken to the mission-house. The scenes of that interview will long be remembered by all who were present. The husband, who carried there a rebellious heart, returned with a broken one, pleading with his still agonized wife to yield herself into the hands of the Saviour, whom he had found willing to receive him. A few hours only intervened before she could rejoice in him, and unite in heart at the family altar he had established. From that time their efforts in the cause of Christ were progressive, and many were led by their spirit and conversation to exclaim, "What hath God wrought?"

Years have since passed, and the beloved Maria has, we trust, received from her Saviour her everlasting crown, and is now praising him in the heaven she did not lose; while her husband still lingers on the shores of time, to glorify God by an active Christian course, and to train their babes for immortality.

A CHINESE BOOK.

Copied for the Recorder from the North China Herald.

The Emperor Heinfung versus Heterodox Sects.

"IMPERIAL TRACT, IN TERRO METRE," is the title of a folio pamphlet recently issued at Pekin, and probably also at all the provincial capitals. The Hangchaw edition contains six pages, is got up in the best style of Chinese typography, being printed on fine white paper, and neatly stitched in gilt covers. It is published under the auspices of H. I. M. Heinfung, but was prepared by the Haulin or Imperial Academy, in obedience to the commands of the late Emperor, who gave for a text one of the sixteen political-moral maxims of the Emperor Kanghi—"Discard heterodox sects, in order to promote orthodox doctrines." The son and successor of that monarch wrote a commentary on the maxims, forming, with a paraphrase by a Minister of State, what is called the Sacred Commands, which a law now in disuetude requires to be read to the people semi-monthly in the tutelary temple of every city. Of these homilies, the most remarkable is that founded on the above maxim, which is mainly directed against the Budhist and Taouist Sects, whose dogmas and mummeries are made the subject of satire; a passing thrust also is at the same time made against the Roman Church, acknowledging at the same time the astronomical services of the Jesuits. But this work (which is in almost every body's hands) was not considered one for the times. It is supposed, by intelligent natives, that Taoukwang, anxious to counteract the effects of the edict of toleration passed upon him by Keying and Lagrini, and alarmed by the efforts made through the press for the introduction of the religion of foreigners, desired some antidote to the poison, and accordingly committed the task of preparing a defense of orthodoxy to the philosophers and statesmen composing the Haulin. After an interval of nearly two years, their joint labors have appeared in the above-named volume, and now the Cabinet of Pekin appears to have entered the lists right earnestly against Tract Societies, as one means of counteracting the aggressive spirit of Christian Missions.

This Imperial tract consists mainly of a panegyric on the Established Faith, and the condemnation of Budhism and Taouism, with a bare allusion to other sects, which reflect the worst features of these dissenting bodies. In this form, the work could hardly be considered as having been prepared with any reference to Christianity, but the edition (which is gratuitously distributed from every district college in this province) is accompanied with notes by the Governor of Chikiung, which clearly indicate the main object of the pamphlet. His excellency says that "in some of the hilly and maritime districts of the province, where the people are comparatively excluded from the happy influence of the sages, the human relations are discarded, and propriety annihilated by means of doctrines of which history has hiterto made no mention, and which are unknown to the Inner Land." This note doubtless contains the gist of the whole matter, and the tract will prove as effective in stimulating the literati to the maintenance of Confucianism, as if the foreign religion had been expressly named and formally denounced. The Chancellor of the province, during the late prefectural examinations at Ningpo, admonished the literati to beware of the teaching of foreigners, and suggested the establishment of free schools in town and country, for the preservation of the common people from their pernicious doctrines.

THE NESTORIAN PILGRIM.

Sixteen years ago, when the mission to the Nestorians was yet in its infancy, an old man came from Geog Tapa to the city of Oroomiah, leading by the hand his little son, whom he presented to Mr. Perkins in the following manner: "This child is no longer mine, he is yours; he is no longer Nestorian, he is English; his name is no longer Yohannan, it is John." The father of the boy was, for a Nestorian of that day, rather an intelligent, liberal minded and serious minded man. He had seen something of the world, having traveled as far as Jerusalem; and, though unable to read, had many ideas in advance of his people. He was one of those who hailed the coming of the missionaries with the sincerest joy, and foresaw in this event new and untold blessings for his people. The boy thus presented to Mr. Perkins, though pleasing in his manners and bright as a scholar, for a time disappointed all our hopes; and, instead of becoming a follower of Jesus, gradually became very hardened under the kind and heavenly influences thrown around him. Six years ago, when, as we supposed, almost lost to God and lost to hope, he was awakened by the Holy Spirit; and, before the delightful revivals commenced, with which this field has of late been blest, and while all around him were in a state of great stupidity, he was heard singing the song of redeeming love. Since that time no convert has shone with a brighter or more steady light, or been more eager to gather jewels for his Saviour's crown. In this "John" many will recognize at once the present pastor of Geog Tapa, with whose name and labors thousands in America are quite familiar. The little boy was now become a man and the father of a family, and is strong in the grace which is in Christ Jesus.

A short time since I visited him at his home. On approaching the house, the old man, his father, now far advanced towards ninety years, yet still preserving much of his vigor of mind, came forward and grasped me by the hand. "Bless God," said he, "that I live to see this day. I will praise him with my whole heart for bringing you to our people once more. This God is our God forever and ever; he will be our guide even unto death."

Soon after my arrival here, I had inquired about John's father, and heard that he was still alive; but now learned for the first time that he had become totally blind. On expressing sympathy with him in this affliction, he replied, "Do not think I am unhappy, now that my eyesight has gone. My Heavenly Father has taken away from me the privilege of seeing the sun, moon and stars, and the faces of my friends, and above all of this my beloved child, only that I may see more and enjoy more the beams of the Sun of righteousness. I praise God for what he has done. Once my thoughts used to go here and there and every where, and to be filled with the things of this world. Now I see not, and yet I see. I see God, my Father. I see Christ, my Saviour. I see heaven, my home. A few days more and my eyes will again be opened, and I will follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth." [Stoddard.

A WORD SPOKEN IN SEASON.

While on a journey for my health in 1812, on a hot, sultry day, I called at a farm-house in one of the beautiful towns in Berkshire county, Mass., to procure a drink of water. There happened to be no one in the house but a young lady, apparently about sixteen years of age, to whom I was introduced by my traveling companion, and from whom I received a glass of that refreshing and healthy beverage, which flows in such rich abundance from the hills of New England.

As I arose to depart, I took her hand, and said, "Permit me, my dear girl, before I leave you, to inquire whether you have yet given your heart to your precious Saviour?"

She replied in the negative, while the tear that stole down her cheek, showed that she was not without feeling.

I then said to her, "My child, I am a minister of Jesus Christ, and as such, it is not only my duty, but my privilege, to offer you eternal life, upon the condition of your repenting of your sins, and putting your trust in him; will you accept of this offer?"

She answered with deep emotion, "I cannot decide that question now."

I said, "You will have to decide it now, Jesus Christ is beseeching you by me, to be reconciled to God; and if you do not choose to tell me what your decision is, he will take the answer from your heart, and it will be recorded in heaven, that you have either accepted the offer of eternal life made to you by your Redeemer to-day, or that you have rejected him again."

She seemed to take a new view of her fearful responsibility, and wept convulsively; but could not be prevailed on to tell her decision.

After repeating some appropriate passages of Scripture, to show her her duty and her danger, I left her, expecting to see and hear of her no more, until we should meet at the judgment-seat of Christ.

Years afterward, on stepping upon a steamboat in New York, to go to Philadelphia, my name being called by some of my friends on board, a gentleman came up to me, and asked if my name was Wisner. On being answered in the affirmative, he inquired if I had ever been in the town of ——, in Berkshire county. I told him I had passed through it in 1812. He then informed me, that when he was coming from home, a lady requested him, if he should meet me on his journey, to say, that she was the individual who gave me the glass of water—that what I had said on that occasion sunk so deep into her heart, that she could find no rest until she hoped she had closed in with the offer of her blessed Lord; and that she wished me to accept her thanks for what was to her, truly, "a word spoken in season."

How many opportunities, more promising than the one which, by the grace of God, resulted in the conversion of this dear girl to her Saviour, do Christians and Christian ministers suffer to pass unimproved, and yet the Master has said, "Sow your seed in the morning, and in the evening withhold not thine hand." LICENSING OF MINISTERS.

An article in the Baptist Memorial, deprecating the hasty licensing of candidates for the ministry, suggests a few thoughts which we submit to our readers. We do not believe in the system of licensing at all. It has no warrant in the Scriptures, and if there are considerations of expediency to justify it, they are not obvious to us. Our objections to the system we shall endeavor to set forth.

It is nothing uncommon for young converts, in the fervor of their new-born zeal, to imagine themselves called to preach the gospel. Their exercises on the subject are, in process of time, laid before the church; and though all the older members may be well persuaded that it is a mistaken sense of duty under which these young brethren are laboring, such is the earnestness with which their application for letters of license is urged, that their request is granted, the church feeling that its own responsibility in the case is diminished by the fact that it is only a license, and not a full investiture of the office of the ministry. Now, in our humble opinion, if the church felt that its action was to be final, it would proceed under a deeper and more solemn sense of responsibility. The mere fact that a brother feels himself pressed in spirit, would not be taken as prima facie evidence of his call to the ministry, which it would be sinful to oppose; nor would his importunity to be licensed gain an improper advantage in that diminished state of responsibility which the church feels, when, instead of clothing him with full authority, it is called upon to make him only half a minister.

The general idea of a licensed preacher is that of one who may enter a pulpit, whenever and wherever an opportunity is given, take a text, preach, and conduct all the usual services, like any regularly ordained minister, while he is prohibited from administering the ordinances of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, and from assuming the pastoral charge of a church. The civil law also refuses to recognize him as a proper officer to solemnize marriages. Now, in certifying his competency to preach the gospel, as is done by a letter of license, the church professes to act in view of the will of the Great Head, that laborers be sent into his harvest. She acts in view of the great commission. But that commission says, "Go teach all nations, baptizing them," &c. And we should like to know where the authority is found for separating the office of teaching from that of baptizing.

Brother A. is a zealous, well-meaning man, and much affected by the miserable condition of those who know not God. On all suitable occasions, he exhorts them to flee from the wrath to come, and even weeps when he addresses them. His brethren admire his earnestness, and bid him God-speed, though they cannot see anything in his exhortations indicating a talent for expounding the Scriptures; and remembering that it is written that a bishop must be "apt to teach," they would not encourage his aspirations to the ministry. He, however, thinks he has a call to the work. The imagination haunts him by day and by night, so that he fancies that if he should resist the impulse, it would be a resistance of the Holy Spirit. He tells his exercises to the church. He says that he can have no peace if he is not set into the work. He comes once and again with the same story. He is a good brother, and nobody will run the risk of hurting his feelings by declaring to him plainly his lack of the necessary gift. At last, worn out with his importunity, and brought up to the point of saying yes or no, the church concludes to take its part of the responsibility, and clothe him with such power as he asks for at the time, secretly hoping that the ordaining council will not be so deficient in moral courage, but take upon itself the unpleasant business of putting a stop to his preaching career. Thus the church, from the mere want of that moral courage which faithfulness to the cause of Christ ought always to inspire, certifies to a lie, and endeavors to palm off the lie upon community.

But brother A., having now the written permission of the church, and holding it for a year or two, becomes more strongly confirmed in the impression that it is his duty to preach than ever. Finally he asks for ordina tion. At the instance of the church, an ordaining council is convened. He is examined as to the ground of his hope as a Christian, and gives satisfaction. He is examined as to his call to the ministry, and tells the same story that he had before told to the church. He is questioned as to his doctrinal views, and is judged to be sound. But who knows any thing of his "aptness to teach?" O, the church has decided that matter, long before; and would the council have been summoned together upon such important and solemn business, if the brother had not, in the judgment of those who were accustomed to hear him, proved his "aptness?" Well, perhaps not; at all events, it does not seem reasonable. But if some member of the council, more rigid than the rest, should withhold his consent till he could obtain some personal satisfaction of the candidate's abilities, an appointment is then made for the candidate to preach his "trial sermon." He preaches, and the council assembles again. The subject is talked over, and some give this opinion, and some that. But the result is finally summed up by one of the older members, (perhaps the moderator,) who says, "It is true, the candidate did not display any great gifts; but then, we must remember that he was very probably embarrassed, standing up before a set of critics, as he naturally supposed us to be, and much allowance ought therefore to be made. Besides, he has had a license from the church for so long a time, which shows that, when he has had opportunity to preach under less embarrassing circumstances, he was judged adequate for the work. Our opportunity has been comparatively nothing, and we must not set up our judgment in opposition to that which has been formed under circumstances more likely to insure correctness." In this view of the case, the council proceeds without farther scruple, and brother A. is regularly set apart for the work.

Is this a mere fancy sketch? Every one conversant with the practice of independent churches, particularly those of the Baptist denomination, knows that it is not. Some consider it an unavoidable evil, growing out of the independent form of church government, and would have such cases committed entirely to the jurisdiction of a presbytery. But, in our opinion, the remedy would be worse than the disease. Abolish the license system altogether. Make no man half a minister. Let the church feel that in setting a man into the office, it is clothing him with all the authority which, as a minister of the gospel, he can possess; and that for such an act it will be held responsible. Let it feel, that what is once done cannot be lightly undone; that there is no division of responsibility with some other judicatory; that it is an act, upon which may rest consequences of the most momentous nature. The license system tends to destroy all such feeling of responsibility.

We have but very imperfectly sketched our views, but what we have said may be sufficient to set our readers to thinking for themselves. Our views have not been hastily adopted, but are such as we have entertained for many years. Time and experience does but confirm our opinion of their soundness.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Monod, Roussell, and Kossuth—Loss of the "Birkenhead."—Church of England—Passover—British Museum.

GLASGOW, April 9th, 1852.

It is so far satisfactory to be able to state, that the rumored expulsion of Monod and Roussell from France, formerly alluded to, has not been confirmed. Meanwhile, however, accounts have been received, that the Rev. M. Kossuth, a zealous, eloquent, and successful Protestant minister, has been suspended in Prague. He is a relative of the ex-President of Hungary, and this fact, as well as his decided opposition to Popery, may have led to this result.

Although those on whom the tower of Siloam fell were not sinners above all men, and although God, in His long-suffering, bears with transgressors, yet from His Word we learn that He often visits sin with sore calamities. And looking at divine Providence in this, as in other aspects, there are many humbling lessons being read unto us. Lately the bursting of a dam above the village of Hohnfirth, occasioning, besides the destruction of much property, the loss of 100 lives, created a sad sensation. This week the tidings of the loss of four times that number of lives by the wreck of the Government steam vessel "Birkenhead," is another solemn admonition, which we are called to improve. This ship was carrying out troops to the Cape of Good Hope for the maintenance of the Caffre war, and was within a few hours' sail of her destination, when she was wrecked, on the 26th of February, near Simon's Bay, and nearly two-thirds of those on board were drowned.

The Bishop of London has taken one of his clergymen, the Rev. J. E. Gladstone, A.M., into the Court of Arches. The Bishop inhibited him from preaching in the beginning of the year; but such measures have lost much of their terror in our land, and the inhibited minister continued without intermission to officiate in his chapel, in Long Acre, London, as if no such occurrence had taken place—his first discourse thereafter having been in behalf of the Dorcas Society. His offense was, speaking too freely of the responsibility and culpability of the Bishop for the Popish mummery which continues to be enacted in the Church of St. Barnabas. The Bishop having heard of the sermon, summoned its author, (who is first cousin to the Hon. W. E. Gladstone, M. P.,) to explain or answer for his presumption; but there being no proper evidence, the matter was suffered to drop. The discourse afterwards appeared in one of the serials, which enabled the watchful Bishop to institute an action. The case in its preliminary stage has come before the Court, when Mr. G., contrary to usual practice, pled his own case at the bar. The result will be watched with interest by not a few.

We formerly noticed that the Rev. Mr. Miller, Birmingham, proposed to diversify the Episcopal Church service, by dividing it, and taking on different days different parts. This the Record, the Evangelical party's newspaper, seemed at first to approve; but the Tractarians having denounced the proposal when carried out as Evangelical "invasion," the Record became afraid that "other plans, equally novel, may very probably be projected by other clergymen." It was indeed our hope, that instead of custom, or Tractarian Liturgy law, (which we apprehend was the Record's dread,) it might have led some to a consideration of the more important deviations from Scripture truth which were still left. Dr. Hook of Leeds was stated to be in favor of the shortening of the service by the omission of parts.

Fifty-five thousand lbs. Passover cakes, costing £916. 13. 4, were this week distributed to the metropolitan and itinerant Jewish poor in London. The richer portion of the members of the synagogues are usually laudably attentive in this respect.

The estimates for the maintenance of the British Museum for the year 1852–3, just furnished to the House of Commons, give the amount required as £52,343, being less than last year by £5,519. The salaries are, £24,618; purchases, &c., £15,385; binding, £8,395. The number of visitors, from Christmas 1850, till Christmas 1851, is set down at 2,524,754. Since we last noticed this Institution, the Library has been furnished with a MS. Supplemental Catalogue of 153 volumes, folio, of which two copies are supplied. These, with those of the old Catalogue, are ranged along the sides of one of the large rooms, with rows of strong oaken desks before them for students.

J. A. BEGG.

MISSIONARY CORRESPONDENCE.

From a missionary letter of O. P. Hull, Wisconsin, we make the following extracts:—

To hush the people of this place (Douglass Corners) into quietude, they have the labors of a Universalist preacher, who is a man of more words than wisdom in moral philosophy. A short synopsis of a sermon I listened to here, will give you his Plan of Salvation.

'1 Tim. 4: 4—Every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving.

'Is man a creature of God?

'As a compound being, he is not, because he is not good. Rom. 3: 12.

'His mind is good, (Rom. 7: 22,) therefore of God.

'The physical man is not good, (Rom. 7: 18,) therefore not of God; for God is good, and no evil can come from a good source. And in death the mind returns to God who gave it, free from its cumbrous load, washed, in death, as a sheet that is cleansed from its filth. The physical man is a spontaneous production of nature, and shall return to the earth as it was.'

I have not yet been able to give any public lectures on the Sabbath question, though I have distributed tracts, and conversed with various individuals, as opportunity has been afforded.

One Baptist brother had read the Address to the Baptists twice, and loaned it to another; and, when I last saw him, had sent for it to read again. He said, he 'did not see why we have not the Bible on our side.'

Last fall, I fell in company with a Baptist minister from Connecticut, who said he had preached to some of our churches 'down east,' and was well acquainted with all our arguments. He believed, and regretted deeply, that we had fallen into such an error, and made such a schism in the Baptist denomination. He then commenced giving me some instruction with regard to Christians not being under the law, but under grace. We had not conversed long, when he took the position that Christians were a favored people; and the same things that would be regarded as sinful in a wicked man, would not be imputed as sin to a Christian. But he soon recanted his position, denied its being the doctrine he preached, and said he might as well confess it all, that he did not understand our arguments as well as he thought he did; and promised to review the question, and obey the dictates of his judgment. I gave him some tracts, and we parted."

At Milton, I enjoyed a pleasant interview with two Methodist ministers. One of them, in detailing some of his labors in earlier life, remarked, that in Ireland he was endowed with the civil magistracy, to shut up shops, stop teams, call people into church, &c.; and politely suggested that, if he were to hold such office in this country, under similar laws, he supposed he should feel himself in duty bound to enforce the law against Seventh-day Baptists. Upon which, the following conversation in substance took place:—

'The dominion of civil government is a question that, I think, we, as a self-governing people, ought to understand.'

'Understand,' said Mr. F., 'if I were in a government where it was required.'

'Then I take it that, being in our country, under its present laws, you would feel yourself in duty bound to pursue the track of the panting fugitive, and bring him back to his tyrant master. And I should like to know how the civil arm can clothe with authority to oppress with impunity the conscience of a brother.'

'But this would not compel you to labor on the seventh day, but simply to cease from labor on the first day,' said Mr. F.

'But what right has the State to rob a portion of her citizens of one sixth part of their time?'

F. 'Has not the State a right to make such laws as she pleases, and a right to set apart such days as the majority shall choose to observe?'

'The question before us respects the dominion of civil government, and consequently is a question of principle; and this principle is written in the very constitution of man. And I do not know that numbers have any thing to do with determining the moral principle of a question.'

Here the other minister interposed, and said:—

'I am at a loss to know what the dominion of civil government, or the duty of the magistrate is, unless it is to minister the law of God.'

'What part of the law of God?' I inquired.

'Why not all its requirements upon man?' was his reply.

'Well,' I rejoined, 'let us try it, and see how it will work. God requires men to repent and be baptized; and how would it please you to have the sheriff sent out, to bring men and women in fetters to the sanctuary of God, and compel them to be baptized?'

F. 'But here, sir, we have the start of you; for we baptized our children.'

'But this may only be a start in error; for the requirement preparatory to the putting on of Christ in baptism, is repentance; and I should like to know how sleeping innocence can retract from a sin it has never committed. The eucharistic feast affords another proof of your inconsistency; for to this there is a prerequisite, which is faith. "He that eateth this bread, and drinketh this cup unworthily, (i. e. not discerning the Lord's body,) eateth and drinketh damnation to himself." These ordinances are to be enjoyed only upon the ground of faith; and they hold a connection with the conscience so intimate that the coarse arm of the civil magistrate, with all its physical power, cannot even find it, much less control it. And why? Because they are ordinances which enjoin devotion to God, and not to our fellows. But no more so than the Sabbath. And if Sunday is a Christian ordinance, as you maintain, and as it must be if it commemorates the reurrection of Christ, and should be enforced by the magistrate, why not the others?'

F. 'Then you are opposed to all civil legislation, I take it.'

'By no means; for God has ordained that there should be civil governments. Rom. 13: 1. And this is what I understand of that verse, that the magistrate is the minister of God for good to the honest citizens; and the Apostle grounds his argument upon the second table of the Decalogue, concluding his remarks with this comprehensive proposition, that love worketh no ill to his neighbor; therefore love is the fulfilling of the law, and is a source of protection, not of dictation, to the conscience. And while liberty of conscience is one of the inalienable rights of man, I should like to know how you are to rob your Seventh-day Baptist brethren of one sixth portion of their time, without working ill to your neighbor, And how you are to make your judgment the dictator of another man's conscience, is a question that I should like to see you reconcile with the freedom of the will.'

Here the conversation turned upon the identity of the Sabbath, when the clock striking eleven admonished us to bring our remarks to a close. After commending ourselves to Him who careth for us, I trust all felt the importance of our having such an high-priest as can have compassion on the ignorant and them that are out of the way.

CHURCH MEMBERSHIP.

By what action does one become a member of the visible church of God?

What I mean by visible church, is that body of associated believers, who have their officers—"first, apostles; secondly, prophets; thirdly, teachers," &c.; clothed with disciplinary power, so that they "put away that man from among them;" capable of "receiving" the strong, and "him that is weak in the faith;" and styled "the body of Christ." There is, in my opinion, some way by which the candidate is acknowledged a member of that body, and is said to have put on Christ. I will state my views of the matter, with some of my reasons.

I am of the opinion, that all baptized believers were considered members, that by the act of baptism they were constituted visible members, and that it was the only act by which one was received into the apostolic church. The organizing of a church is called the "planting" of it. This form of expression is used in the Old Testament Scriptures. "Now will I sing concerning my well-beloved a song of my beloved, respecting his vineyard. My well-beloved had a vineyard on a very fruitful hill; and he digged it, and gathered out the stones thereof, and PLANTED it with the choicest vine," &c. Isa. 5: 12. "Yet I had planted thee a noble vine, wholly a genuine seed." Jer. 2: 21. "For the God of Hosts, who planted thee, hath pronounced evil against thee." Jer. 11: 17. From these passages it is seen, that the bringing into existence, or organization under the Jewish economy, was called by the prophet the "planting" of it. The same figure is used by the prophet when the church "shall inherit the land," and this too "when their sun shall no more go down." It is said of the church, at this time of her great glory and strength, "Thy people also shall all be righteous; they shall inherit the land forever, the branch of thy planting, the work of my hands, that I may be glorified." Isa. 60: 21. The same form of expression is used in relation to the organization of the Christian church. "I have PLANTED, Apollos watered; but God giveth the increase. So, then, neither is he that PLANTETH any thing, nor he that watereth any thing, but God who giveth the increase." Paul had been the active agent under God of raising up and establishing the church, and in view of the part he acted in this matter, the believers were "a seal of his apostleship," for he was a father unto them.

But in all this we are not told how this act of "planting" was performed. One says it was done by the "right hand of fellowship;" another "by the laying on of hands;" the third "by a vote of the church." Let us now have Paul's testimony, and see what he says of his manner of "planting." "Know ye not, that so many of us as were baptized into Jesus Christ, were baptized into his death? Therefore, we are buried with him by baptism into death, that like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life; for if we have been PLANTED in the likeness of his death, we shall be also in the likeness of his resurrection." Here we are distinctly taught how we are made members of that "body;" it is by being "planted together," and not separately. See Rom. 6: 3—10. If such positive testimony can be strengthened, strength may be had by referring to 1 Cor. 12: 12, 13. "For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body, being many, are one body, so also is Christ. For by one spirit are we all baptized into one body."

If it is objected, that this is not water baptism, but spiritual baptism, I answer—1st, This would be a departure from the scope of the apostle's reasoning. He was teaching the necessity of being influenced by the Spirit of God in all their duties. He says, "The manifestation of the Spirit is given to profit withal. For to one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom," &c., see verses 7 to 10. Here the Spirit is represented as being present, qualifying and acting upon the subject, leading to duty, thus "dividing to every man severally as he will." As the Spirit had acted upon them thus in the performance of those other duties, so it had acted on them and led them to be "baptized into one body," "whether they be Jew or Gentile." By this public declaration, they exhibit the power of the gospel to "make of twain one new man, so making peace."

But a second answer is, if we make this a spiritual baptism, and understand this to take place at our conversion, then we are made members of the visible church by our spiritual birth, for in this "he hath set first, apostles; secondly, prophets," v. 28; so that we are compelled to admit that this is water baptism, or that conversion constitutes us the members of God's visible church, which is only saying, in other words, that "the believers of any given district constitute the church of that place."

REVIVAL IN BROOKFIELD, N. Y.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

Believing that the news of a revival of religion will be hailed with joy by yourselves and all your readers, permit me to say through your columns, that the Lord has graciously visited the Second Seventh-day Baptist Church of Brookfield by the outpouring of His Spirit. For several weeks there had been increasing interest manifested in the Sabbath meetings; when, about the first of March, a series of evening meetings were commenced, Eld. Joshua Clarke preaching and visiting from house to house, while the brethren and sisters, who had been anxiously praying for months for a shower of divine grace, stayed up his hands by fervent prayer. Meetings continued every evening for three weeks, and richly have their labors been rewarded. About thirty have professed a hope in Christ, and twenty-two have already followed their Saviour in Baptism, and twenty of them united with the church, among whom were two converts to the Bible Sabbath. There are several others whom we confidently hope will go forward and witness the strength of their attachment to Christ, by following in His footsteps.

Yours in truth,

DAVID P. CURTIS.

BROOKFIELD, April 22, 1852.

REVIVAL IN RICHBURG.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

The Seventh-day Baptist church at Richburg has been encouraged this winter in her efforts to build up the Redeemer's kingdom. The Lord has heard the earnest prayers of his people, and blessed his word. These blessings have fallen upon us like a gentle shower, bringing up the religious interest gradually and intelligently, until the church has been strengthened, the youth enlisted to read the Bible, and sinners have been converted to God. The meetings have been held in part on the edge of the society; so that others, and some of them advanced in life, have shared in these mercy drops. Nineteen have joined the church; sixteen by baptism. Of these last named, six have embraced the Sabbath. 'The Lord has done great things for us, whereof we are glad.'

THE DEAF AND DUMB.

We have received a copy of the 33d Annual Report of the New York Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, with accompanying documents, submitted to the Legislature on the 27th of February last. One of the daily papers gives the following statement of the contents of the Report, and of the recent commendable act of the Legislature in favor of the class for whose benefit this institution is designed:—

The report covers the year 1851, during which the receipts of the institution, from all sources, amounted to $38,526 66; while the disbursements were $40,105 44. The number of pupils, and their several sources of support, are thus stated:—

Number embraced in the last catalogue	227
Number admitted in 1851	50
Whole number within the year	277
Left the institution	34
Actual number in the institution Dec. 31, 1851	243
Of the foregoing there are 135 males and 103 females	243
Supported by the State of New York	100
Supported by the City of New York	16
Supported by the State of New Jersey	15
Supported by their friends	24
Supported by the institution	28—243

Six graduates of the institution are employed in the department of instruction, and nine in the domestic and mechanical departments, making the whole number of deaf mute inmates 258. The healthfulness of this large family is a just subject of gratitude, only one pupil having died, and no illness having occurred except a few cases of measles in a mild form.

By arrangement with the Superintendent of Common Schools, the institution has for several years past received all suitable applicants, gratuitously, in anticipation of vacancies in the State list. The pupils thus received became so numerous that the funds at the disposal of the institution were inadequate for their maintenance, and during the late session of the Legislature, an application was successfully made for an increase of the number fixed by law about seven years ago. The recent act provides for the admission into the institution of one pupil from each Senatorial District, in addition to the present number, at the expense of the State.

The Directors remark, that "the principle has long since been admitted, as a cardinal one in the policy of the State, that all the children of the State have a claim on the State for the means of education; and in the case of the deaf and dumb, that claim is stronger, as their moraland intellectual destitution surpasses that of all others."

Annexed to the Directors' Report is an extended and highly interesting account of the visit made by Dr. P. Peet, the President of this institution, in the summer of 1851, to the various institutions for the deaf and dumb in France, Italy, Switzerland, Belgium, and Great Britain. The whole number of known institutions of the deaf and dumb in the world is stated to be 101; of which 19 are in Great Britain; 44 in France; 11 in Italy; 10 in Switzerland; 10 in Austria; 35 in Prussia; 6 in Wurtemberg and Baden; 18 in Saxony, Hanover, and the other German States; 4 in the German free cities; 10 in Belgium and Poland; 13 in the United States of America; 1 in Canada; and 2 in Asia.

PROTESTANTS AND PAPISTS IN NEW YORK.—Exulting over the recent sale of the church edifice in Astor Place to the Roman Catholics, the Freeman's (Roman Catholic) Journal takes occasion to intimate that the Protestant churches in this city are fast dying out. Mr. J. Greenleaf, of Brooklyn, replies through the New York Observer, by showing that no less than forty-five churches, of all denominations, have been organized in the city of New York since January 1, 1846, of which number ten are Presbyterian, nine Episcopal, eight Baptist, six Methodist, six Roman Catholic, three Reformed Dutch, and three Lutheran. During the same time, eight were disbanded, leaving a balance in favor of Protestantism, in six years, of twenty-five churches. The aggregate number of churches in New York is two hundred and fifty-five, of which twenty-three are Roman Catholics.

BAPTIST EDUCATIONAL EFFORTS.—The Baptists have done nobly for Education within the last two or three years. Over sixty thousand dollars is said to have been raised for Madison University, $125,000 for Brown University, and $200,000 for the University and Theological Seminary at Rochester, besides considerable sums for the endowment and current expenses of other denominational institutions. We see it stated, also, that the Trustees of the Newton Theological Seminary have determined to raise $50,000 for that institution, while the Baptists of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia propose to raise the same amount to endow Arcadia College.

THE MISSIONARIES SAFE.—We are happy to be able to announce to our readers, (says the Christian Watchman and Reflector,) that the Rev. Mr. Kincaid and Dr. Dawson and their families are safe at Maulmain. The particulars of their escape from the perils of war at Rangoon, have not yet reached this country. The fact of their safety will cause joy and thanksgiving in many hearts. We regret to state that nearly all the property of the missionaries, including the valuable library of Mr. Kincaid, was lost.

THE FIRE AT HONG KONG.—Rev. Mr. Dean writes from Hong Kong, under date of Dec. 29, "We had last night a dreadful fire here, which destroyed some six or eight hundred houses, and left eight or ten thousand Chinese homeless. The buildings on the opposite side of the street, bounding the mission lot on the north, were all destroyed, but by the mercy of God we were spared."

REVIVALS AND MINISTERS.—A very striking fact is stated in reference to the students of the Gettysburgh Lutheran Theological Seminary, which, we doubt not, will be found true of other denominations, in its proportion. The Lutheran Observer says that of the two hundred and forty-four students who have graduated at that Institution, and gone into the ministry, one hundred and thirty-one are known to have been converted in revivals; and that more intimate knowledge would probably increase the number. Of the eighty students now in the Seminary, one-half received their spiritual life under revival influences.

RELIGION IN JAMAICA.—Letters from English Baptist missionaries represent the state of religion on the island as highly encouraging. Many have been added to the churches, and a spirit of religious inquiry is widely diffused. Rev. Mr. Richardson, of the American Missionary Association, writes that within four or five months twenty-three persons had united with the church at Brainerd under his care, and that a large class of inquirers demanded his care.

BAPTIST HOME MISSION SOCIETY.—It is gratifying to be able to announce, says the N. Y. Recorder, that the receipts of the Home Mission Society for the year ending March 31st, have considerably exceeded those of any previous year, being upwards of forty thousand dollars, from all sources. The amount of donations and legacies exceeds thirty-eight thousand—being about eight thousand over the receipts of last year.

ANNIVERSARIES IN NEW YORK.—The national religious anniversaries, usually held in New York in the month of May, will commence on Sunday evening, the 9th of May. The American Bible Society, by which the time is regulated, has its meeting on the second Thursday in May, which this year falls on the 13th.

NATIVE PREACHERS IN INDIA.—Three young men have been licensed and set apart in Calcutta to preach the Gospel, by the Calcutta Presbytery of the Free Church of Scotland. They were all natives, and had for some time been employed in missionary work in connection with the schools.

BAPTISTS IN WISCONSIN.—From the Minutes of the Convention, it appears that the number of churches in the State is 87; pastors 60; baptized 418; five associations, and 10 unassociated churches. Total membership, 4011.

Prof. Robinson Abroad.—A letter in the N. Y. Evangelist gives a sketch of the journey of Rev. Edward Robinson, D. D., to Palestine. He arrived at Beirut March 2. In London, the Geographical, Ethnological and Syro-Egyptian Societies, and many distinguished savans, took a warm interest in his object. At Berlin he received the attentions of Ritter and the venerable Humboldt, and Lepsius gave him a large party, at which a host of Oriental travelers were present.

"The trip from Smyrna to Beirut," writes Dr. R. to a friend in this city, "was all new to me; and is the same as Paul's course, described in Acts 20th and 21st. Like him, we passed over against Chios and by Samos, and Coos (now Stanco) and Rhodes and Cyprus. Unlike the apostle, our voyage from Smyrna to Rhodes was made in one day. We saw, also, Patmos on our right, and likewise Baffa (Paphos) on the S. W. coast of Cyprus. These Greek Islands, both the Cyclades and the Sporades, are objects of great beauty—fine mountainous forms, being, indeed, not much more than the peaks of mountains rising above the sea."

The Bibliotheca Sacra and American Biblical Repository, for April, contains a large amount of critical, doctrinal, exegetical, and geographical matter. The following is its table of contents:—

I. India as a Field for Inquiry and Evangelical Labor, by Rev. H. R. Hoisington, missionary of the American Board.
II. The Grotian Theory of the Atonement, by Rev. L. Swain.
III. Life of Zuingli, by Prof. Robbins.
IV. The Writings of Richard Baxter, by George P. Fisher.
V. Observations on Passages of Scripture, by Prof. Stuart.
VI. The Practical Element in Christianity, by Rev. Charles White, D. D.
VII. Remarks on the Idea of Religion. From the German. By Rev. Wm. A. Stearns.

An Essay on the Millennium; in which the theory is built upon plain Revelation—a long Millennium before the Second Advent. By Eld. Elias Burdick, Missionary of the Seventh-day Baptist Central Association. Norwich, N. Y., published by J. D. Lawyer, Stone Block, corner of East and South Main Streets. Price, one shilling; ten or more copies for ten cents each; nine copies sent by mail for $1, postage paid. Address, post paid, Smith Johnson, Preston, N. Y.

Such is the title of a thirty-six page pamphlet, which has been laid on our table. The Essay was written in the winter of 1843, read before the Oswego Baptist Ministerial Conference, published then by their request in the N. Y., Baptist Register, and now re-printed in a revised and improved form. The general drift of it is sufficiently indicated by the title.

Jenny Lind's Farewell Concerts.—Madame Otto Goldschmidt (late Md'lle. Jenny Lind), will give her last concerts in America before her departure for Europe, on the evenings of Tuesday the 18th, on Friday the 21st, and on Monday the 24th of May—the last one to be in Castle Garden, where she commenced her career in America.

☞ A. D. Titsworth, Treasurer of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society, requests his correspondents to address him hereafter at Plainfield, N. J.

☞ Eld. Stillman Coon has removed from Milton, Wis., to Southampton, Peoria Co., Ill., and requests his correspondents to address him accordingly.

European News.

The British Mail Steamer Asia arrived at New York on the 21st inst., with three days later news from Europe, being to April 10.

The general news by this arrival does not possess any feature of striking importance, while business affairs had been partially suspended by the observance of the Easter Holidays.

A deputation of the merchants of London and Bristol engaged in the palm oil trade have had an interview with Lord Malmesbury, to remonstrate against the injury which the blockade of the Slave Coast does to their commerce.

The Manchester Commercial Association have called on the Government to negotiate more favorable commercial relations with the Kingdom of Siam. They complain that their trade with the kingdom is ruined by the operation of the U. S. Tariff. They state that English merchants who import tea from Siam into England are shut out from the American market, because on entering an American port from England the tea is charged with a duty of 20 per cent., although it may be imported direct duty free. The English merchant is thus kept out of a second market unless he import all his tea in the first instance to the United States, and America is thus becoming the emporium of the trade. The same disadvantages apply to coffee and some other imports.

Since the sailing of the Arctic, letters and papers from the Australian Colonies have come to hand, dates being to the end of December. There have been three arrivals, with some thousand ounces of gold, and other vessels are on their way with rich consignments. Advices by these arrivals confirm the largest of the gold stories. Among the lumps found is one weighing 341 ounces, and estimated to contain thirty-three ounces of pure gold. Another piece of ore weighed ninety ounces, and another eighty-two. The precious metal is found mostly near the surface, the largest lumps are jammed in crevices of rocks. The total yield of the diggings in the first three months is $3,500,000.

Meetings in favor of retaining the Crystal Palace are being held in London and elsewhere. It is understood that the French Government would buy it, but the people (properly so called) seem averse to have it removed.

An English joint stock company undertakes, if the money be forthcoming, to lay a submarine telegraph between Portpatrick, in Scotland, and Donaghadee, in Ireland, a distance of twenty-one and a half miles; the telegraph to be in operation by the 20th May.

It is announced, both in the French and English papers, that immediately on the fall of Rosas becoming known, the British and French Governments appointed a joint commission to treat with Brazil to open the waters of the Rivers La Plata, Parana and Uruguay to the commerce of the world.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, APRIL 19.

In the Senate, several petitions were presented in favor of support to the Collins steamers. A bill to prevent the execution of criminals in the District of Columbia was ordered to a third reading. The French Spoliation bill was taken up and passed, 26 to 13. The Deficiency bill was then taken up, and Mr. Gwin made a grand onslaught on the Administration for extravagance, especially in the War Department, which he urged as an argument against the election of a military man for President.

In the House, the whole day was spent upon the printing question. The subject was finally referred to the Printing Committee.

THIRD-DAY, APRIL 20

In the Senate, the Military Committee reported a bill to improve the efficiency of the army. Among other things it abolishes allowances of double rations, except to the general officer commanding separate armies actually in the field; abolishes all allowances of pay and emoluments on account of brevet rank, except to majors and captains in the Adjutant General's office, and the Judge Advocate of the Army, and abolishes all bounties to non-commissioned officers and soldiers. It provides that, after the 1st of August, 1852, the monthly pay of officers shall be: Colonels, $90; Lieut. Colonels, $75; Majors, $60; Captains $50; 1st Lieutenants, $40. It provides that each non-commissioned officer, artificer, musician or private, who re-enlists within one month after the expiration of each term, shall be allowed $2 per month additional during the second enlistment, and $1 additional for every re-enlistment exceeding the second. The Deficiency Bill was then taken up, and after considering several amendments, the Senate adjourned.

In the House, after some unimportant business, the Naval Discipline Bill was discussed a while, and then the Homestead Bill was taken up and continued on hand till the hour of adjournment.

FOURTH-DAY, APRIL 21.

In the Senate, several communications were received from the different Departments. Petitions for and against aid for the Collins Steamers were presented. Mr. Clarke's Non-Intervention Resolutions were then taken up and postponed till Fourth-day next. After some further unimportant proceedings, the Deficiency bill was taken up. The Collins Steamer amendment created considerable discussion. Mr. Gwin made a long speech in support of the amendment. Mr. Hunter opposed it at length, and said he saw no difference between protection to iron and protection to steam. Mr. Miller got the floor, and the Senate adjourned.

In the House, the Naval Discipline bill was taken up, and after discussion, Mr. Stanton's substitute was rejected. So was Mr. Millson's. The bill was then laid on the table. A report in favor of the incumbent Delegate from New Mexico was made; and then the House went into Committee on the Homestead bill.

FIFTH-DAY, APRIL 22.

In the Senate, after a personal explanation by Mr. Mangum, (in which he gave Mr. Brooks of N. Y. an awful political overhauling,) the Apportionment Bill was taken up, and the proposition to give Louisiana an additional member of Congress, for her fraction, was rejected. Mr. Bradbury's substitute, giving South Carolina a member for her fraction, and giving California two members, (making 234 Representatives, in all,) was adopted. The Deficiency bill was taken up. Mr. Miller made an elaborate defense of the appropriation for the Collins steamers. Mr. Seward got the floor, and then the Collins steamers item was passed over informally. Mr. Borland moved an amendment, relating to the papers publishing the laws, &c., upon which the Senate adjourned.

In the House, among reports from Committees was one from the Committee on Elections, declaring that Mr. Fuller, the sitting member from Pennsylvania, was not entitled to his seat. The Homestead bill was then taken up, and Mr. Maloney, of Illinois, advocated it, and Mr. Sutherland, of New York, opposed it, as agrarian and unconstitutional. The House then adjourned.

SIXTH-DAY, APRIL 23.

The Senate spent the whole day upon private bills, of which it passed twenty, and then adjourned till Second-day.

In the House, considerable time was taken up by Mr. Brooks of N. Y., in a personal explanation of matters alluded to by Mr. Mangum in the Senate yesterday. The remainder of the day was spent principally upon the Homestead Bill.

SABBATH-DAY, MARCH 24.

The Senate was not in session.

In the House, the Homestead Bill was the principal topic of discussion. Mr. Moore, of Pennsylvania, presented a memorial, signed by 1,500 citizens of Philadelphia, asking for the passage of the bill. Mr. Chandler presented a petition seven yards in length, full of names, asking for its passage. Speeches in favor of the bill were made by Messrs. Ewing, Sibley, and Fichlin, after which the House adjourned for want of a quorum.

At Providence, R. I., last week, Joseph D. Pratt was convicted of manslaughter for shooting Wm. C. Radliff. Pratt had lost many of his hens, and got a neighbor to watch with him to catch the thief. He armed himself with a gun loaded with beans and shot, and on seeing Radliff going off with some of his hens, fired and wounded him, so that he died in a short time. Pratt confessed the act, and immediately delivered himself to the officers. He told the officer that at the time Radliff was shot, he was engaged in preparing a place to watch in, and that he heard a noise among his hens, caught up his gun, which was lying beside him, and fired it without bringing it to his shoulder.

The Freshet last Week.

The Virginia papers are filled with the details of the damage by the recent flood. The towns of Worthington, Fairmount, Riverville, and Newport, were inundated, and many houses were swept off. More than forty houses were seen to float past Fairmount. Every house except one, and a part of two others, in the village of Worthington, was swept away. In Fredericksburg and vicinity the damage done was very great. Falmouth Bridge was entirely swept away.

The destruction of property along the Potomac river by the flood is beyond calculation. Two families of eleven persons were drowned near Hancock. Houses and barns near the river have been swept off in great numbers. The canal is greatly damaged, and may not be repaired for a year.

The west branch of French River, in Charlton, Mass., rose higher than ever known before, and carried away the reservoir dam belonging to C. L. Harding & Co., of Oxford, and Samuel Slater and Sons, of Webster. The reservoir overflowed 300 acres. The rush of so large a body of water carried away several dams and bridges, and caused considerable destruction to property below. In Charlton a grist-mill and saw-mill, with two dams, were carried away. Two or three bridges in Oxford were destroyed; also Fenner's dam and Fisher's dam at Fisherville. The dam of Samuel Slater & Sons is gone, and a storehouse containing 100 bales of cotton, which were seen floating down the river.

The rise in the Merrimac and Concord Rivers was greater than ever before known, being full 13 feet above summer level. In Belvidere, a suburb of Lowell, nearly all the houses were surrounded by water to the depth of four to five feet. In Centerville, from sixty to one hundred families were driven from their houses—some in boats—and their cattle were saved by swimming. In Lowell, the Middlesex, Booth, Massachusetts, Prescott and Lawrence Mills were obliged to suspend work, the yards being overflown—and in some of them the water reached the machinery in the lower rooms.

Loss of a Bark with Thirteen Lives.—The Boston Daily Advertiser has received a letter from a correspondent at Provincetown, dated April 21, which states that just before dark on the 20th, the bows of a vessel, broken off just abaft the fore rigging, were seen on the outer bar, about a mile N. of Highland Light, with fifteen persons upon it. The rest of the vessel and cargo were washing along the shore. The persons upon the wreck could be heard calling for assistance; but the tremendous sea upon the shore, combined with the darkness and a dense fog which set in about that time, prevented help being given them. Fires were built on the beach, and people lined the shore. A dory was procured, and two men named Jonathan Collins and Daniel Cassady, of Truro, made an attempt to get off. They succeeded in getting near enough to converse with those upon the wreck, when their frail boat was capsized, and both were drowned. During the night two of the shipwrecked crew were washed ashore on pieces of the wreck, and were rescued nearly exhausted. The remaining thirteen perished. The vessel known to be wrecked is the Josepha, of Gloucester, England, a ship or bark which sailed from Bristol March 19.

SUMMARY.

Another land route between New York and Boston will be put in operation during the present year. Responsible parties have agreed to extend the Norfolk County Road (running from Boston to Blackstone) from Blackstone to Dayville on the Norwich and Worcester Road. The new road will be about 25 miles in length. The New Haven and New London Road will be completed in June, and this, with the New London and Willimantic Road, with which the Norwich and Worcester connects at Norwich, will make a continuous railroad route between the two cities some 20 miles shorter than the route via Springfield. It is anticipated that by this route, next November, passengers will be taken between New York and Boston in six and a half hours.

A very important verdict was rendered recently in Jefferson County, N. Y. The defendant was on board the cars of the Hudson River Railroad Company during a recent serious collision, and professed to have been very badly hurt by it; on the strength of which claim, the Company allowed and paid him $250 damages. Learning afterward that his pretense of injury was grossly exaggerated, if not wholly fraudulent, they traced him out and sued him, and have just recovered a verdict for the amount paid him, with costs.

Patrick Cass has recovered a verdict of $100 and costs against the New York and New Haven Railroad Company, being the value of a trunk and contents placed in possession of the baggage-keeper, in June last, but not delivered. The ticket or check received for it, had been lost, and the agent refused to deliver the trunk when demanded, and it was subsequently lost. The Court held that in common law the Railroad Company is liable for the loss of baggage intrusted to their care.

The down express train of the Harlem Railroad having got behind time on Saturday, the engineer, knowing that the track was clear, put the steam on the "iron horse." He ran one hundred and three miles in two hours and ten minutes, including three stops to take in wood and water. Deducting fifteen minutes for the time lost in the three stops, makes the average of the running time a mile in one minute and two seconds.

Mayor Berry, of Williamsburgh, publishes a letter on the subject of moral treatment for the insane, in which he states that he has ascertained in his last visits to the Lunatic Asylum, that the reception of newspapers by that unfortunate class of patients, produces a very satisfactory impression upon them and seems, decidedly, to call them back, for the moment, to some degree of reason.

Dr. Greene, convicted of forgery at Mobile, has been sentenced to ten years' imprisonment in the Penitentiary. He was once a very respectable citizen, and an earnest and zealous member of the church. He made a most affecting speech to the Court, in which he appealed to their mercy on behalf of his wife and children.

It is said that the President has ordered the Utah Judges back to their posts, and intimated that they had better resign if not disposed to go. They have expressed a determination neither to go nor to resign. It is understood the President has determined to remove them.

Papers from all parts of Western Virginia continue to give details of the damage by the recent floods, which is said to be immense. Whole towns have been swept off, and a vast quantity of produce in warehouses, waiting transportation, has been damaged. In Morgan County the damage is estimated at $100,000. Fifteen bridges on Parkersburgh and Stanton turnpike have been carried off.

Mrs. Fenter F. Hutchins, of Peacham, Vt., being sick, two female acquaintances called upon her to inquire after her health. One of them, holding a candle in her hand, approached the bed, when the alcohol which had recently been applied to the person of the sick woman took fire, and she was enveloped in flames in an instant. She was so badly burned that she died before morning.

The vessels of the Arctic searching expedition, under the command of Capt. Sir E. Belcher, were to sail from the Thames on Thursday the 15th inst. A supply of 20 pound canisters of gunpowder, to be exploded by galvanism, has been placed on board the vessels for the purpose of breaking up the ice, and forcing a passage for the steamers through Wellington Channel.

Mrs. Norton, wife of Hartz C. Norton, of Norwalk, Ct., died suddenly at New Haven, while her medical attendant was administering chloroform, for the purpose of extracting a tooth. It was administered at her request, and, before it seemed to take any effect, her pulse suddenly fell, and she died.

Near Sandusky, Ohio, there is an old clergyman of the Lutheran Church, named Lehmanosky. He served under Napoleon until he was overthrown at Waterloo, when he became a soldier of the cross. He says that eighteen of Napoleon's colonels subsequently became clergymen, as did a number of his inferior officers.

The steamer Pocahontas, from Arkansas, bound to New Orleans, with 2,360 bales of Cotton, took fire on Friday, April 16, and burned to the water's edge in half an hour. Ten persons were either burned or drowned, including a former Sheriff of Arkansas, his lady and three children, a cabin-boy, two firemen and a chambermaid.

The attention of the musical circles of Germany has been lately excited by the debut of a young pianist and composer, named Frederick Gernsheim, only ten years of age, who is pronounced to be one of the greatest wonders in the history of music. He intends visiting Paris and London.

The Jackson (Miss.) Star says that while Kossuth was in that city on a visit to Governor Foote, a distinguished citizen of an adjoining county made an affidavit against him, charging him with a violation of the neutrality act, and praying for a warrant for his arrest. The application was refused.

Ten thousand square feet of land, in the Washington Cemetery, near New York city, have been deeded to trustees for the erection of a monument, one hundred and fifty feet high, to Henry Clay, the cost of which is to be raised by subscription, from twenty-five cents to one dollar, from the ladies of the United States.

Brackett's admirable group of 'The Shipwrecked Mother and Child,' now on exhibition in this City, is wrought in American Marble, from an extensive quarry in West Rutland, Vt. Probably the finest marble in America is found on the Western slope of the Green Mountains.

The Agent of the Emperor Solouque of Hayti has purchased in Paris a library of all the French classics in the best editions and most expensive bindings. Upon both sides of the covers are wrought the imperial arms, which consist of a palm tree, with the motto, "God, my country, and my sword."

A dispatch dated Oswego, Wednesday, April 21, 1852, says: The ice in the St. Lawrence is broken up. The steamers Ontario and St. Lawrence have commenced their regular trips. Hereafter they will leave for Ogdensburg each morning, and each afternoon for Lewiston and Niagara Falls.

About 3 o'clock on Thursday, April 22, a fire was discovered in the rear part of the National Theater, Boston, and in three-quarters of an hour after, the immense wooden structure was completely consumed with its contents—only a few dresses and properties being saved.

A son of Mr. Wm. McClure accidentally hung himself at Pilot Knob, Crawford county, Ia., on the 4th inst. He made believe to hang himself, to frighten his little sister, and while so doing by some means missed his hold, and before the alarm was given and he could be cut down, life was extinct.

It is estimated that the annual product of all the cotton mills in the United States is 250,000,000 yards, and the consumption of cotton 600,000 bales, 100,000 of which are consumed in the Southern and Western States. Its value, when manufactured, is supposed to be more than $67,000,000.

The Troy papers state that a Mr. Wellet, while digging a well in that city, found some gold ore at the bottom. The geologists shake their heads at the statement, but it seems Mr. Wellet has already sold the half of his prospective profits for twelve thousand dollars.

Rev. Dr. Dowling, of Hope Chapel, New York, has accepted a unanimous call from the Sansom-st. Baptist Church, Philadelphia, lately under the care of Rev. Dr. Malcom, who has been elected President of Lewisburg University.

Ross Winans, of Baltimore, has recovered in the United States Circuit Court, at Philadelphia, damages to the amount of $5,400 from the York and Maryland Line Railroad Company, for using his patent-righted eight-wheel cars.

During the past winter there have been five hundred and twenty-nine converts to religion in Pike county, Illinois. Three hundred and eighty-six joined the Methodist Church, eighty-one the Baptist, and sixty-two the Congregational.

The late fire in the baggage car on the Pennsylvania Railroad, is supposed to have originated in a box of lucifers carried in the trunk of some foolish passenger. The loss is estimated at from $6000 to $8000.

Bayard Taylor, in one of his letters to the Tribune, says the Turkish name of America is Yenkee-Doonea. This sounds very much like Yankee-Doodledom, but is in reality the Turkish for "New World."

Adhesiveness is a large element of success. Genius has glue on its feet, and will take root on a marble slab.

Advices from Jacmel, Hayti, to the 11th, have been received. The coronation of Solouque as Emperor of Hayti, which was to take place on that day, was further postponed to the 18th inst., and efforts were making to prevent it altogether.

Hon. E. Long and Hon. J. W. Crisfield, both of Maryland, were arrested at Princess Anne, Wednesday, April 14, and put under $10,000 bail, to prevent them from fighting a duel. Judge Spence gave the information that led to their arrest.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Miscellaneous.

Adventures of a British Subject sold into Slavery.

At the Thames Police office, one day last week, says the London Times of March 23, William Houston complained to the magistrate that he, a free-born British subject, had been sold into slavery by a sea-captain, with whom he had engaged as steward for wages. He exhibited his register ticket as a "seaman," No. 548,818, and stated that he was born in Gibraltar, in the year 1810, his father a native of San Domingo, and his mother a London woman. About thirteen years ago, when settled in London, he shipped in the Broad Oak at Liverpool, at steward, for $25 per month. The Captain's name was Joseph M'Coy.

On the arrival of the ship at New Orleans, the vessel was sold, and the captain took him on shore and sold him to an American, by whom he was taken to a place called Tricupo, in St. Matthew county, where he remained in bondage for five years, when he found means to communicate with a lawyer. His owner, having learned that measures were about to be adopted for his liberation, put him in irons, and sent him back to New Orleans, when his owner's cousin, a surgeon, Charles Le Blond, took charge of him, and sold him for a good price to one Henry Boardman, an American, who kept a kind of public house in New Orleans, but did not keep him long, in consequence of his threatening to appeal to the British Consul.

He was next bartered to Henry Lynch, an Irishman, who let him out on hire to a Captain Willis, by whom he was engaged to serve as a drummer in the American army, under General Taylor. He remained with the army for two years, was engaged in the war with the Mexicans, and received a sabre wound on the head at the battle of Monterey, and was wounded in the right leg by a shot at the engagement of Buena Vista. He was laid up in the hospital at Tampico for seven months, and, on his return to New Orleans, cured of his wounds, the marks of which were still visible, was sold to John Rustno, a boarding-house keeper, who would not detain him as his slave, on discovering that he was free-born, and a British subject, but put him in jail, and sued Lynch, the Irishman, for the purchase money. After remaining in prison for twelve months, the sheriff of the place took him out, and conveyed him to another prison, where he remained two months, and then, in accordance with the laws of the State, he was sold again to another Irishman, named Gardner, of St. Charles street, New Orleans, and the purchase money was appropiated towards the expenses of his maintenance in jail. He again claimed his privilege as a British subject, and Gardner sold him to a lawyer, named John Howard, of Baker street, New Orleans, to whom he also communicated that he was a British subject.

Howard did not keep him long, and disposed of him to Mr. Barber, a Scotchman, of Natchez. He was only with Mr. Barber one hour, when he was again sold to a Mr. Lapiere, and he informed him that he was a free-born man from England, and asked him when he was going out of town. Mr. Lapiere replied, at five o'clock in the evening, and he requested his name and address, and an order to get his clothes from John Howard. Mr. Lapiere gave him his name and address, and the order, with which he immediately posted off to Mr. Mayhew, the British Consul.

Mr. Mayhew questioned him upon his adventures, and put the case into the hands of a lawyer, who took him before a judge, and he made oath that he was a British subject. After that was done, the British Consul said he must again remain in jail till the business was settled, and he was consigned to the hands of Sheriff Lewis, who kept him in jail for one year and three months, acting as cook and white-washer. Fearing that the Consul had forgotten him, he wrote to him again, and in less than half an hour after its delivery, the Consul came to him and asked him if he was ready to go home to Europe that night, to which he replied in the affirmative.

He was immediately put on board the ship Ann Doherty, bound to Liverpool, where he arrived on the first of January last. He left Liverpool towards the end of last week, and walked up to London, where he arrived on Tuesday night, in the hopes of obtaining redress. The magistrate, having elicited from the complainant that the captain who had thus wronged him was not in his jurisdiction, and complainant had no idea where he was, could give him no redress.

A Tale of Suffering.

The Fredericksburg (Va.) News narrates the following extraordinary incidents in the life of a man named Watson, who, some fifteen years ago, left Alexandria, settled in King George County as a merchant, married a highly respectable young lady, by whom he had four children, and subsequently became a widower and a bankrupt:

"With his little children, two of whom were daughters, he lived on a small farm which he rented, three miles below the line separating Stafford and King George. During the coldest of the weather in the latter part of December last, his children were seized with whooping-cough, and every one of them prostrated.

"While thus confined, their father was taken with erysipelas, and in the same room lay the father and children, perfectly helpless. While thus confined, some fiends broke into his meat and fowl houses and stole every fowl and piece of meat on the farm. In doing so they passed through the garden, leveling the fence, and thereby permitting the cattle and hogs to destroy all the vegetables intended for winter use. The only thing left for the support of the family was a small quantity of corn-meal and some unroasted coffee. In that condition they lay a large portion of the time, without water, without fire, and without food.

"A poor widow in the neighborhood sent them a small piece of meat, and the eldest boy, not quite so ill as the rest, did, as long as his strength would enable him, crawl to the fire-place, stir up the dying embers, half cook some bread, fry a piece of meat, and, with coffee without milk or sugar, attempt to relieve the hunger of his dying father and sisters. On one occasion, weak and feeble as he was, he staggered through the snow to a neighbor's house to procure fire. At one time the father and children would be crying for water, and not a drop in the house, and no one to bring it. Thus they lay for several days, until God, in his mercy, took two of the children.

"Two days did they they lie corpses by the side of their sick parent, and no one to prepare them for sepulture and convey them to the tomb. A man accidentally passing by, called in, found the family as we have described them, the father blind and insensible, with his two dead children—one frozen to death—lying by his side, and left them in that condition. Two days after this the father died. The night preceding his death he had hemorrhage and bled most profusely. By his side were his son and his daughter, barely able to raise their heads, but nerved to the occasion they sat by him the whole night alone, using every means their infant minds could suggest in stenching the blood. A poor widow, the day of Watson's death, heard of it, came to his house, had him and his two dead children buried, took the sick ones home with her, nursed them, and has since restored them to health."

Pruning and Grafting Old Trees.

Mr. N. P. Morrison, an experienced fruit grower in Somerville, Mass., communicates the following as the results of his observation and practice, to the New England Farmer:—

In Lowell, I had the opportunity of examining the operations of grafting, and I came to the conclusion that the operator shook the trees and caught the birds, while his employer's anticipations would not be realized. The grafting, I think, was done by the job, so much per scion, and the bill for two small trees amounted to almost five dollars, when all the labor which was necessary in doing the work could have been done for less than one-half that sum. The number of scions set was too many. One-half the number would have been all that were needed to form a good tree. I noticed there were several small branches within a few inches of each other; from six to ten scions were set where there should have been but two, by cutting the limb below where the branches separated. Another error in grafting is, in leaving limbs too near the scions when set, so as to impede their growth; this should always be avoided. Other trees I have noticed frequently, while traveling, which had been attempted by having six or eight scions set in the low limbs where twenty or thirty were necessary to have formed a good tree. I saw a man grafting for a friend of mine, and as he was an experienced workman, I had the curiosity to stop and examine the trees, and ask a few questions in regard to grafting, hoping to gain some information in so doing. His scions were set in few of the middle branches, and according to the appearance by grafting so few stems, he did not intend to injure the trees but very little, for the scions would eventually be left, in the few instances above named, to take their own course, consequently they would be overrun with branches and left to wither and die. I inquired why he did not set more scions in a tree! His reply was, "The man who employs me wants to make all the cider he can." I suppose he meant until the scions came to maturity. This we see is economy outdone.

I have found some trees which had twice the number of scions set requisite to form a good top, while others fell short in the same proportion. Now it will appear, from the many observations I have made, that farmers and many others who have land and trees to improve, feel conscious that something ought to be done in renovating and improving their fruit trees in order to give them a profit which is realized by thousands who have their work thorougly done. Therefore, give the farmer knowledge, perseverance, (and I must say) temperance; these all combined, will give him the satisfaction of seeing his labors crowned with abundant success.

I have about eight acres of orcharding, and have so managed in pruning and grafting as to give all the old trees mostly new and vigorous tops. I commenced in 1842, taking off the large and low limbs which were in the way of the team when plowing, and continued the same process yearly until my horses could walk without coming much in contact with any of the limbs. I found that taking off the under limbs (which is too much neglected) increased the growth of what remained, new shoots came forward, which now compose a good part of my trees. Too many large limbs should not be taken from a tree in one season. I have cut off limbs that were six or seven inches in diameter, and have applied cold beef tallow to the trunk where they were cut, and the trees have done well. My pruning is mostly done in Feb. and March, scraping the trees immediately after, which I think well pays for so doing. I keep the land plowed and tilled, where it is not too much shaded. Grafting I have done in April and May. There were about forty large New York Greenings, which proved to be almost barren and worthless. I have grafted all of these, and many more which bore inferior fruit. I have sold the apples which grew on two of them the past season, for over fifty dollars, and the sum total for all the last season will amount to seven hundred dollars. I was informed that sixty-two barrels was the most ever raised in one season previous to my purchasing the farm.

I state these facts for the encouragement of others, that they may see what can be realized in reclaiming and improving old apple trees. The process in setting scions is very simple, but the number needed, and where to to be set, in order to give an even and well-balanced top, requires both care and judgment.

Trees should be thoroughly examined in order to see where, and how many limbs should be grafted, to give each an equal division or space to grow in, and make a well-shaped top. I generally commence at the hightest branches and work downward, so as not to interfere with the scions after setting. Do all the grafting to each tree in one season, leaving a few scattering limbs that will not interfere with the scions, for one year, then take off all remaining limbs and leave the sprouts, except when near the scions, for one year, then cut all, or most of the sprouts, and leave but one scion on a stalk, if the growth has been good, if not, let the two remain a longer period. Never graft very low limbs, for they always incline downward after bearing fruit.

Hot Beds.—Now is the time for hot beds. All you want is a frame of inch boards, or plank, the size of your bed, and about one foot high in front, and two feet in the rear. Then put in small rafters, just stong enough to hold the sashes, and use good clear glass, lapped a quarter of an inch. Fresh horse dung is the best manure; and the more the better, at least you must have enough to generate the proper degree of heat. After the dung is placed in the hole, you should cover it with the richest and lightest mold that can be procured. There is nothing better than the decayed leaves of the woods, that lie in a black stratum upon the surface of the ground.

Operative Surgery.

Two remarkable operations have recently been performed in our city, which present the very antithesis to each other in the mechanico-surgical operations. The remarkable success which attended the manipulations of the two operators still further adds to the already distinguished position of New York in all that pertains to surgical science and skill.

The first case was the excision, (or what is usually termed amputation,) of the whole lower jaw-bone from its sockets in the cranium. This terrible and most difficult operation was performed by Professor J. M. Carnochan, who in a very short space of time completely dissected the jaw-bone from its numerous adhesions and sockets, an operation rendered necessary by extensive disease in the substance of the bone. Perhaps this is the most extensive, painful, and formidable operation to which the human body can be subjected. So entirely successful was the operation, that, strange as it may appear, little deformity is observable in the man's face or the expression of his countenance.

The other case presents an opposite to the above operation, in supplying the loss of the lower jaw-bone and teeth, by artificial substitutes. This surgical-mechanical operation was performed by Dr. A. C. Castle, Surgeon Dentist of this city. This complicated casualty presents one of those interesting cases which proves the remarkable extent of injury the animal system is capable of sustaining, without destroying life. These cases also exhibit the wonderful strides of the modern resources in surgical and mechanical science in combatting and overcoming difficulties, however terrific and formidable they may be. The last case was that of a brave young officer—who, with his men, in pursuit of the enemy, (the latter having availed themselves of an inviting piece of chaparral,) endeavored to force them from their hiding place, and while so engaged, he received a double charge of buck-shot in his face, jaws, and neck, which completely destroyed the soft parts, and carried entirely away two-thirds of the lower and a large portion of the upper jaw-bones. Dr. Castle's skill enabled him to overcome every difficulty presenting itself. He contrived artificial substitutes, answering all the purposes of the jaw-bones and teeth. The cheek had in the first instance been replaced by the operation of bringing up the healthy portion of the skin from the neck; and this, too, was done without producing any unnatural deformity.

Evidence of Personal Identity.

A recent occurrence in the Courts of our city (says the Boston Journal) adds another to the many instances of the fallibility of human judgment in cases of personal identity. Mr. Shepardson, a respectable citizen of Roxbury, was accused of obtaining butter at several stores by false pretenses. He was arrested, taken before the Police Court, and bound over for trial at the Municipal Court. The case was tried, and several witnesses swore positively to the identity of Shepardson as the guilty party. The jury, however, in the face of the previous good character of the prisoner, were unable to agree upon a verdict. Before the case came up for trial a second time, circumstances transpired which confirmed the asseverations of Mr. Shepardson and his friends that the witnesses were mistaken in the identity of the man who committed the offense. A Mr. Holbrook was found, who, besides bearing a strong personal resemblance to Mr. Shepardson, was accused of offenses similar to those charged upon that gentleman. It also appeared that he drove a horse and sleigh of similar appearance. He was arrested and held to bail, and it will be seen by the report of the proceedings of the Municipal Court to-day that the witnesses against Mr. Shepardson have acknowledged that they were mistaken in the identity of the offender, and the indictment against him has been abandoned by the District Attorney.

It will be recollected that in the Webster case two or three witnesses swore positively to having seen Dr. Parkman on the afternoon of his murder. Had not the jury been convinced that these witnesses were mistaken, as subsequently clearly appeared, the guilty would have escaped punishment. These facts teach the necessity of great caution in testifying to the identity of individuals.

The Secret.

"I noticed," said Franklin, "a mechanic among a number of others, at work on a house erected but a little way from my office, who always appeared to be in a merry humor, who had a kind word and a cheerful smile for every one he met. Let the day be ever so cold, gloomy, or sunless, a happy smile danced like a sunbeam on his cheerful countenance. Meeting him one morning, I asked him to tell me the secret of his constant happy flow of spirits.

"No secret, Doctor," he replied, "I have got one of the best of wives; when I go to work, she always has a kind word of encouragement for me, and when I go home she always meets me with a smile and a kiss—and then tea is sure to be ready, and she has done so many little things during the day to please me, that I cannot find it in my heart to speak an unkind word to any body."

Liability of Railroad Companies.

Harring against the New York and Erie Railroad.—This case, in which some important questions affecting the liability of Railroad Corporations, both upon general principles of Law and under the Statutes of New York, was tried at the Rockland Circuit before Judge Brown, in the fall of 1851. The husband of the plaintiff was run over by the cars of the Company and killed. It appeared from the plaintiff's evidence that, at the place where the highway crossed the Railroad, there was an excavation extending some distance on the line both of the highway and the Railroad. The cars approached the place of crossing at their usual speed. The plaintiff, who was riding in a sleigh, drove down upon the track, at the crossing, at the rate of about a mile in five minutes. It also appeared from the plaintiff's evidence that, at the time of the accident, the bell upon the cars was not rung while crossing the highway, as required by statute. The whistle, however, was sounded. The counsel for the Company moved for a nonsuit, claiming that the facts showed that Harring was himself negligent, and that although the Company might have been guilty of a violation of the statute, yet that was not material to the issue, unless such violation was the proximate cause of the injury. After full argument, Judge Brown granted the motion and nonsuited the plaintiff. The plaintiff appealed to the general term, and the case was heard at the present general term at Brooklyn, before Jutices Morse, Barculo and Strong. The motion to set aside the nonsuit was argued by F. C. Bliss, Esq., for the plaintiff, and D. B. Eaton, Esq., of counsel for the Company; and the Court, upon the argument, affirmed the opinion and judgment of Judge Brown.

The Colosseum at Rome.

This wonderful building, which for magnitude can only be compared to the pyramids of Egypt, and which is perhaps the most striking monument at once of the material greatness and the moral degradation of Rome under the Empire, was commenced by Vespasian, but at what time is uncertain, the date assigned by Lepsius, A. D. 77, being more than doubtful, and completed by Titus, who dedicated it A. D. 80, when were slaughtered 5,000 animals of different kinds. There is an ecclesiastical tradition, but not entitled to much credit, that the architect of the Colosseum was a Christian, and afterwards a martyr, named Gaudentius, and that thousands of the captive Jews were employed on it. In the reign of Macrinus, on the day of the Vulcanalia, it was struck by lightning, by which the upper rows of benches were consumed, and so much damage done to other parts of the structure that the games were for some years celebrated in the Stadium. Its restoration was commenced by Elagabalus, and completed by Alexander Severus. It was again struck by lightning in the reign of Decius, but was soon restored, and the games continued to be celebrated in it down to the sixth century; the latest recorded exhibition of wild beasts being in the reign of Theodoric. Since that time it has been used, sometimes in war as a fortress, and in peace as a quarry, whole palaces, such as the Cancellaria and the Palazzo Farnese, having been built out of its spoils. A Good Story.

The following excellent story is told of Mr. Sheaf, a grocer, at Portsmouth, New Hampshire:—

It appears that a man had purchased some wool of him, which had been weighed and paid for, and Mr. Sheaf had gone to the desk to get change for a note. Happening to turn his head while there, he saw in a glass, which swung so as to reflect the shop, a stout arm reach up and take from the shelf a heavy white oak cheese. Instead of appearing suddenly and rebuking the man for his theft, as another would, thereby losing his custom forever, the crafty old gentleman gave the thief his change as if nothing hadhappened, and then, under pretense of lifting the bag to lay it on his horse for him, took hold of it and exclaimed—

"Why, bless me, I must have reckoned the weight wrong."

"Oh, no," said the other, "you may be sure you have not, for I counted with you."

"Well, well, we won't dispute the matter, it is easily tried," said Mr. S., putting the bag into the scales again. "There," said he, "I told you so—knew I was right—made a mistake of nearly twenty pounds; however, if you do n't want the whole, you need n't have it—I'll take part of it out."

"No, no!" said the other, staying the hands of Mr. S. on their way to the strings of the bag, "I guess I will take the whole."

And this he did, paying for his dishonesty by receiving the skim-milk cheese at the price of wool.

Fowls.

The food I give is as follows:—"Good sound barley and wheat, as much as they can eat, once a day; after that I give steamed Belgian carrots, broken up, with barley-meal; and when these cannot be obtained, barley-meal or toppings. Grass or other green food is indispensable; I also give my birds a full meal of boiled rice every other day, and about twice a week bullock's liver cut into dice. When the chickens are first hatched, the best food is egg boiled hard, and crumbled with bread or fine toppings, and a little barley-meal; and at the same time I give off-corn wheat, with a few split-grits. This food, if given for a fortnight, will forward the chikens in an extraordinary manner; after that time, barley-meal, mixed hard, with water, is very good, with boild rice and wheat. Should chickens, whether young or old, seem at any time ailing, they should be immediately attended to; for never does the old adage, 'a stitch in time saves nine,' become more necessary than in the case of poultry. They should have, first, some sulphur and cayenne pepper, mixed with barley-meal, given them, and afterwards, for a full-grown bird, a tea-spoonful of the following mixture, in the same medium, night and morning:—Elecampane fœnugric, liver of antimony, anniseed, cummin seeds, linseeds, and cayenne pepper, all in powder, mixed in the proportion of equal parts except the last, of which there should only be half used." [British Agr. Gaz.

The Best Fowls.

The Boston Cultivator of Nov. 16th, says: "After being at the exhibition of Poultry in Boston, on the 12th, 13th, and 14th inst., and examining the 10,000 fowls exhibited, and after the most abundant opportunities for examination and comparison, we feel justified in declaring, that, in our estimation, the Forbes importation of Shanghaes excel all others of the same name."

"If farmers only knew the worth of these fowls, (says another paper,) no effort would be spared to obtain them, as they will produce more eggs in four months than any common fowl will in twelve months. I have had a ready sale for all my fowls raised the past season, at prices ranging from $2 to $10 a pair, according to age. From my experience in raising fowls, I am fully of the opinion, that pure blood Shanghae and Cochin China fowls will eventually drive all other breeds out of market. There can be no doubt of this, as they are certainly the best fowls in America for laying, and they are a very superior fowl for the table. I am satisfied, that if farmers would abandon all their common fowls, and procure the Cochin China, or Shanghae fowls, they would realize at least 100 per cent. better profits than they now do. There is no mistake about this, as every person within my knowledge, who has tried the experiment, will testify."

Religious toleration is a duty, a virtue, which man owes to man; considered as a public right, it is the respect of the goverment to the consciences of the citizens, and objects of their veneration and their faith.

Attar of Roses—How it is Made.

The roses of Ghazipoor, on the river Ganges, are cultivated in enormous fields of hundreds of acres. The delightful odor from these fields can be smelt at seven miles distance on the river. The valuable article of commerce known as attar of roses is made here in the following manner: On forty pounds of roses are poured sixty pounds of water, and they are then distilled over a slow fire, and thirty pounds of rose-water obtained. The rose-water is then poured over forty pounds of fresh roses, and from that is distilled at most twenty pounds of rose-water. This is then exposed to the cold night-air, and in the morning a small quantity of oil is found on the surface. From eighty pounds of roses, about 200,000, an ounce and a half of oil, at the utmost, is obtained; and even at Ghazipoor it costs forty rupees (twenty dollars) an ounce.

Cave in Berkshire County.—It will be remembered, says the North Adams (Mass.) Transcript, that, some time since, we noticed this work of Nature, and that its entrance was blocked up so as to forbid further explorations without great labor in removing the rubbish. The cave is in the side of one of the hills which form the base of old Greylock, about a mile south of the village, near the South Adams Road. A narrow and difficult passage, about ten feet in length, leads to a room large enough to contain six or eight persons. Northward, a small horizontal avenue, ten or twelve feet long, leads to another room considerably larger than the first. From this, by descending twenty perpendicular feet, another room is entered thirty feet long by an average breadth of about twenty feet, and twenty feet high. Beyond this, and lower down, are smaller apartments, answering to bedrooms, pantries, &c. Further on no one has explored. The walls of the cavern are composed of limestones, belonging to the vast ledge of which Saddle Mountain is built.

Gold Hunting.—A correspondent in Ohio wants to know whence and at what expense he can get to the gold regions of Australia. The expense we do not know, but the place to start from is San Francisco. Thence there are regular lines of vessels, sailing frequently. From other parts of the Union, there is scarcely ever a ship which sails directly to Australia. But we would advise our correspondent not to try his fortune so far off. The diggins of California are better, as is the company found at them. Another correspondent wants to know what a passage to California will cost in a good sailing vessel, by way of Cape Horn. This will cost about $150. [N. Y. Tribune.

VARIETY.

Out of every thousand men, twenty die annually. The number of inhabitants of a city or country is renewed every thirty years. The number of old men who die in cold weather is to the number of those who die in warm weather, as seven to four. The men able to bear arms form a fourth of the inhabitants of a country. The proportion between the deaths of women and those of men is 100 to 108. The probable duration of female lives is sixty; but after that period the calculation is more favorable to them than men. One half of those who are born die before they attain the age of seven. Among 3125 who die, it appears by the registers that there is only one person of one hundred years of age. More old men are found in elevated situations than in valleys and plains.

On examination the lungs will be found full of innumerable little holes, like a sponge. These holes are the cells into which the air enters when we breathe. So great is their number that they have been calculated to amount to 170,000,000, forming a surface thirty times greater than the human body. Every one of these cells is provided with a net-work of blood vessels, by which means every portion of the blood is brought into immediate contact with the air. When this great amount is taken into consideration, we shall at once feel how necessary it is to supply pure air to the lungs with every breath we breathe.

The Industrial Exhibition in Silesia goes bravely on. The glass palace is building, and must be ready by the first of May. Already 500 exhibitors have entered the names of three thousand articles, from huge steam-engines down to needles which swim upon water, and colossal "cookies" or gingerbread cakes eight feet long. Several trades mean to exhibit their operations in every stage. Glass from the original material to the slightest crystal shred—Silk from the worm to the cloth, &c., &c., and a fountain of Cologne water, as in the London palace, with play constantly.

We all talk of the ass as the most stupid of the browsers of the field; yet, if any one shuts up a donkey in the same enclosure with half a dozen horses of the finest blood, and the party escape, it if infallibly the poor donkey that has led the way. It is he alone that penetrates the secret of the bolt and latch. Often have we stood at the other side of the hedge, contemplating a whole troop of brood mares and their offspring patiently awaiting while the donkey was snufling over a piece of work to which all but he felt themselves incompetent. So says the Quarterly Review.

At the centennial celebration of the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth, Dec. 22, 1850, after an address by Hon. Daniel Webster, the procession marched to the place where the dinner was to be served; as they passed down the long rows of tables, five kernels of corn were observed on every plate, reminding them of that occasion in 1623, when the colony was reduced to a pint of corn, which, when divided among the settlers, gave them each five grains.

In the United States District Court at Boston, on Monday morning, Judge Sprague gave his opinion on the motion to stay proceedings in the case of Wm. R. Pittman and John Dixey, charged with receiving and concealing $8,000 stolen from bark Missouri. The Court was of opinion that the indicture could not be sustained, and the prisoners were discharged. The substantial ground taken by the Court was, that the crime was embezzlement and not larceny, and that the crime of embezzlement was not covered by the statutes of the United States.

We have noticed in the papers lately, several deaths by lock-jaw. We have published several times a certain preventive and remedy, in the application of beef's gall to the wound. Besides its anti-spasmodic properties, the gall draws from the wound any particles of wood, glass, iron, or other substances that may cause irritation, when other applications have failed to do so.

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June of each year.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress.
Rev. J. W. MORTON, } Assistants.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, }

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—
The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term, Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00
Monochromatic Painting	3 00
Oil Painting,	5 00
Writing and Stationery,	0 50
Vocal Music, Elementary,	1 00
Advanced Class,	2 00
Instrumental Music,	8 00

Use of Organ or Piano, $2 00 per quarter.

Board, in private families, per week, from $1 25 to $1 50; in clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter Term, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the common school branches, with daily lectures on "The Art of Teaching," Chemistry, Physiology, Laws of Health, School Laws, &c., &c. Tuition $2 50.

Students should not be furnished with unnecessary pocket-money, neither should minors be allowed to contract debts in the village. Either member of the Faculty will superintend the financial affairs of pupils placed under their care, by special direction from parents and guardians, if funds are furnished in advance.

THE JEWS OF PALESTINE.

At Beyrout, the "Mission from the Church of Scotland" met with Mr. Pieritz, once a Jewish Rabbi at Yarmouth, but then a Missionary of the London Society, who gave them much information relative to the condition and habits of the Jews, and the encouragements to missionary labor among them. We copy this portion of their "Narrative," and with it close our extracts for the present:—

Speaking of the best STATIONS for the labors of a Jewish missionary, Mr. Pieritz mentioned the Grand Dutchy of Posen as one of the most promising fields in the whole world. There are nearly 100,000 Jews there, among whom the London Society have sent three laborers, but there is room for thirty. The Jews there have been enlightened so far as to be loosened from the Talmud, and yet they are not Rationalists. This may be accounted for by their situation among Protestant Christians. Nearly one-half of all the Jewish converts are from that country, among whom are three of the Jerusalem laborers.

In Moldavia and Wallachia there is another great field, hitherto untried. The cheapness of living there is extraordinary, and the resources of commerce are great and unoccupied, so that Jewish inquirers and converts could easily support themselves independently of their brethren. Judeo-Polish and Judeo-German are the languages they speak.

From personal observation, he also mentioned Gibraltar as a desirable missionary station. On one side lies the coast of Barbary, all lined with Jews, each of its towns having several thousands, and these men of singular industry. On the other side are Spain and Portugal, where are many called "New Christians," who are all baptized Jews, to whom a prudent missionary might find access. In Gibraltar itself are about 2000 Jews, speaking Hebrew and Spanish; many of whom at present allow their children to attend Christian schools there. A knowledge of the Arabic language is required by a laborer on the Barbary coast, and Judeo-Spanish on the European side.

Mr. P. spoke further upon the subject of TRACTS FOR THE JEWS. The most useful tract for a Jew is a plain Christian tract, such as one would give to a careless professing Christian, setting before him the simple truth of his lost condition, and the death and atonement of Christ. This is much better than a deficient controversial tract. If it is controversial, it ought to be complete, for otherwise a Jew, accustomed as he is, by studying the Talmud, to acute reasoning, will soon see its deficiency and throw it aside. The tract "Helps to Self-Examination" is good, because it sets before them the law that convinces of sin, and closes with prayer for light. "The City of Refuge" is another that Mr. Nicolayson considered useful.

Some of Mr. Pieritz's anecdotes regarding the Jews in Palestine, were very interesting. In Jerusalem, a Jew named Munsternetze, when pressed much to read the Bible for himself, replied, "But I am afraid." "Why?" "Because (said he) I have a wife and children." He meant, that if he were to study the Bible, he would be convinced of the truth, and would, through the enmity of the Jews, reduce his family to poverty. Six weeks after Mr. Pieritz came there, a learned Jew, named Joseph, visited his house to converse with him, and remained from ten in the morning till five at night; and the result was, that he would not read his rabbinical books any more. Not long after, he came secretly every day, and they read over together most of Isaiah, and all Matthew critically. One day he said that it had occurred to him that, as Messiah should have come just at the time when Christ appeared, it might be the case that Christ, knowing this, had taken advantage of it, and by the force of great genius, had brought all the prophecies to meet in himself. Mr. Pieritz gave him Isa. LIII, Dan. IX, and Zech. XII, to compare and meditate upon. When he had read the first of these chapters, he returned, saying that he understood it; at the same time, he applied it partly to the Jews, and partly to the Messiah as one of the Jews. Mr. Pieritz set him to read all the three chapters. He sat very thoughtfully for a while; then, burst out into the exclamation, "How to understand is easy enough, but how not to understand is the difficulty!" From that time, he became really anxious about spiritual things. One Friday evening, talking of veracity toward God and man, one of the Talmudical prayers was adduced, which says, "I thank thee for commanding" such and such things, although no command has been given for it in the Bible. He felt the force of this at once, and on going home, finding the table spread to usher in the Sabbath, he declined the service. His friends became suspicious of him, but his change became public in an unexpected way. A Mahometan was in the room one day, to whom Mr. Pieritz said, "that the unbelief of the Jews was no objection to Christianity, as many of them did believe," appealing to Joseph, who boldly assented. The Mahometan told this to the Jews, and Jerusalem was turned upside down. An excommunication was pronounced upon Joseph, so awful that the whole synagogue were in tears. They then forced him to divorce his wife, and, by repeated solicitations, to leave Jerusalem for Constantinople, whither he went seeking Christian baptism.

On another occasion, a public controversy was held, in which Rabbi Benjamin was spokesman in favor of the Talmud. It did not last long, but three months after, he came to Mr. Pieritz to say, that, though convinced at the time that himself had the best of the argument, yet, on going home, he had been led to reflect and inquire. Another day, he and Rabbi Eleazar came both together with a list of questions written, but went away without proposing them, after hearing Mr. Pieritz's statement of the truth. They began to read the New Testament together. One evening while thus engaged in one of their houses, Rabbi Abraham came in unexpectedly; they tried to hide their books, but he insisted on seeing them. Upon a vow of secrecy, they showed their New Testaments. He was very angry, but agreed to go with them to visit Mr. Pieritz. He came full of fire against Christianity. He began by showing the inaccuracy of the quotation about Bethlehem-Ephratah in Matt. II, and said many acute things; but Mr. Pieritz kept to the statement of the gospel. Rabbi Abraham soon became the most earnest of the three in his love for Christianity, and all determined to make an open profession. Two of them belong to the best Jewish families in Russia. Chaii or Hyman Paul, a young man, became convinced of the truth and was baptized. He used to go to the convent and argue with the Roman Catholics, telling them that they could not be true Christians, because they did not care for the Jews, but hated them. On one occasion they ordered him out.

On the subject of PROPHECY, Mr. Pieritz agreed in the sentiments of Mr. Nicolayson, that it is quite necessary for a missionary to hold the literal interpretation of prophecy. He mentioned that some Jews in Poland condemn parts of Abarbinel for spiritualizing. The Jews feel their dispersion to be literal; and therefore, if you explain unfulfilled prophecy by saying it is spiritual, they reckon you a kind of infidel. If you say that "a wolf" does not mean a wolf, but a bad man, that "Zion" means the church, and "redeeming Israel" not redeeming Israel, but something else, and yet try to convince them of the truth of Christianity from the Bible, they think that you yourself do not believe the Bible. In arguing with the Jews, it is sometimes of importance to show the similarity between Rabbinism and Popery, and that they have the same author. One day a Jew referred to the follies transacted at the Holy Sepulchre, and said, "That religion cannot be true." The Missionary replied, "They do just as you do, they add to the New Testament, and you add to the Old." Like the Papists, the Jews do not approve of a man reading much of the Bible, because it leads him to speculate, and they say the Rabbinical commentaries contain as much as it is proper to know. The parts of Scripture read in the synagogue, are generally passages that do not directly instruct in doctrine. For example, they read the 52d and 54th chapters of Isaiah, but omit the 53d.

In speaking of the Holy Land as a Missionary field, Mr. Pieritz gave us the smallest estimate we had yet heard of the numbers of the Jews. He reckoned that in Jerusalem there are only 3000 Jews, in Saphet 2000, in Tiberias 1000, in Hebron 700, and in other towns and villages 1300, making in the whole land only 8000 Jews. During the last year he thought there had been a decrease in the Jewish population; for the plague carried away more than those born during the year, and the Jewish emigrants who came to settle at Jerusalem during that time were not more than twenty. As to their means of support, the Ashkenazim depend wholly on the contributions from Europe, except in isolated cases. The Sephardim are not so entirely dependent on this source, as they have a little trade. If the contributions were withheld, they would all be forced to seek support by their own industry, and this would be infinitely better for them. Every intelligent friend of Israel we met agreed in this opinion. There are no Rabbies, properly speaking, among the Ashkenazim, that is, the Rabbi is supported in no other way than as a member of the congregation; but among the Sephardim there are "Hachamim" or "Wise," for they do not call them Rabbies. These are all who are raised above the lower class, and have reached a certain standard of learning. Above this is the class of the "Hacham Morenu" or "Teacher." Him they regard with unqualified respect, and submit to him as a kind of Pope. He is well supported by them, and often lives in affluence. The Ashkenazim do not pay any such respect to their Rabbies. The Polish and German Jews are generally better scholars than the native Sephardim; but, on the other hand, the latter have more knowledge of the Bible. On the Barbary coast, it is not uncommon to meet with very unlearned Jews who are well acquainted with their Bible. There is a mixture of the customs of different countries among the Jews of Palestine; but a general inclination prevails to yield to the manners and laws of the Sephardim; as, for example, in the rites of burial. There is much more of Pharisaism among the Sephardim than among foreign Jews, and much less morality. Polygamy is not unfrequent among them, but is not allowed among the Ashkenazim. There are several in Jerusalem at present who have two wives, and some who have even four. Divorce occurs every day. Mr. Pieritz mentioned one case of a Jewess in Jerusalem, not above thirty years old, who was then married to her fifth husband. In how affecting a manner does this illustrate the question put by the Pharisee to our Lord, "Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause?" and the touching answer of Jesus.

The Jews here are far lower in morals than those in Europe. Those living in Saphet are worse than those in Jerusalem; those in Hebron are the most respectable of all. Their misery also is very great. It is not true, as some have supposed, that though the houses are outwardly poor, they are well furnished within. Yet the Jews are more open and friendly in this land than in any other, because of their misfortunes. The Bible shows that affliction will be one way of humbling them; and it is so here. In other lands, where they are involved in business, or rich and comfortable, they will not attend to the missionary.

The Jews here will take an Old Testament willingly, but often they will read the historical parts only, and not the prophets; for it flatters their national pride to read the story of the wars of their fathers. To remedy this the London Society have published "The Prophets" separately, and these are often sold to them.

The Karaites, or Jews who keep by the text of the word of God and reject traditions, abound most in the Crimea, and hence some erroneously give that country the honor of originating the name. They are generally very ignorant, having no literature of their own. In the Crimea and Turkey, they are said to repeat their prayers in Turkish. Their prayer-book is a beautiful compilation, being taken almost entirely from Scripture, with some hymns; and they do not omit any book of the Bible in the Scriptures, as some have asserted. The other Jews hate this sect more than they do the Gentiles.

In regard to the LITERARY QUALIFICATIONS OF MISSIONARIES, the remarks of Mr. Pieritz have been mostly anticipated. He showed the necessity of a Missionary's knowing more languages than Hebrew. If he speak to them only in Hebrew, he must quote the Scripture simply as it stands in the Hebrew text, which they often understand in a different sense from what he does. For the sake of perspicuity, therefore, he must explain himself in the vernacular tongue—Judeo-Polish or German for the Ashkenazim, and Judeo-Spanish or Arabic for the Sephardim. The study of the Talmud sharpens the intellect much; so that a Missionary who has not studied it deeply ought to have passed through an academical education. The only way of learning it is by the help of some learned Jew. The parts that are not controversial are the most easy. But one who is a Talmudist, and nothing more, will never do for a Missionary. One advantage of Talmudical knowledge is, that it enables the person to argue by Talmudical logic, which is much shorter and more striking than scientific logic. Jews cannot follow a long argument. They do not feel the power of the syllogism; and, on this account, "Leslie's Method" does not suit them.

The concluding words of our conversation with this interesting person were worthy of remembrance. "Rather send one good Missionary than fifty others. I have come after many Missionaries and have wished that they had never been there. It was pleasant to come after Wolff. All the Jews in the place knew what he wanted with them—viz. that without Christ there is no remission of sin."

NUTRITIOUS PREACHING.

"Do you like Dr. S—— as well as ever?" was the question once addressed to a member of the A—— Street Church. "O, yes; his sermons are roast beef and plum pudding to us for a whole week." This was high praise surely, and bespoke a full larder, as well as no small skill in setting out the feast. It gives us at once an idea of the man, and of his sermons, and of the study, too, whence such sermons came. We catch a glimpse of a quiet room, better stocked with standard works than with the literature of Tupper and Gilfillan—of a patient, prayerful man, rising from his knees to adjust his manuscripts for the day; and of an open Bible on the study-table. The hat and cane are laid aside, for he has already paid a visit to the suffering family in the adjoining alley, or to the sick bed of a dying parishioner; and "it is well before preaching to look over the verge." While such a man writes, let no one needlessly intrude, for the robbery of his hour is the plundering of a whole congregation. In a minister's study-hours the "talk of the lips tendeth to penury."

Of the discourses of Dr. S——, on which such a savory encomium was pronounced, we had no personal knowledge; but we can easily conjecture some of the qualities which made them so nutritious.

1. They must have had a great deal of Bible in them. Not an occasional scrap, or a dainty passage culled out to beautify a sentence and round off a period, but wholly saturated with the word of God. Hamilton tells us that Dr. Chalmers' discourses "held the Bible in solution." The strong meat is found in the Scriptures alone. The preacher who never "wears out," or wears his people out either, is he who delves daily in gold mines of revelation.

2. Those nutritious discourses must have had a great deal of prayer over them. There are other men beside the staid Quakers who believe that he who preaches aright must preach "as the Spirit moves him." And through Divine aid comes down the invisible ladder by which the prayer of faith ascended to the Heavenly Intercessor. McCheyne never wrote a line without previous petition to God. Holy John Welch rose at night, and spent hours in pleading for the celestial baptism. "I am convinced," writes an eminent clergyman, "that even æsthetically considered, one hour of prayer is a better preparation for sermon-writing than a whole day of study."

3. They had a great deal of every-day religion in them. They were practical. There is a painful lack, with many ministers, of knowledge of human nature in its daily actings. They are not ignorant men. They are tolerably familiar with John Owen, and Matthew Poole, and Francis Turretin, know all about the Council of Trent, and may even aspire to an acquaintance with the Magdeburg Centuriators. But to the living, acting, laughing, weeping, tempted, and sinning world around them, they are well nigh strangers. During the week their parishioners have been driving a plough, or hammering a lap-stone, or pleading a cause, or have been "up to their eyes" in cotton bales and sugar casks. When the Sabbath comes, these parishioners bring to the sanctuary their every day wants and trials, as citizens, as men of business, as parents, as husbands, or as children. They want preaching that shall tell them how to live as well as what to believe. They want plain instruction. They want doctrine, but doctrine made portable and practical. They hunger for truth, but truth simplified, and purged of scholastic technicalities. We once heard a young licentiate of great promise preach a sermon in which he talked about the "governmental theory of the atonement," and garnished his discourse with such words as "predicate," and "potential," and "subjective." The whole discourse smelled strongly of the class-room, and had probably been "sat upon" by an inquest of theological students during the author's senior year. We would like to have whispered into the brother's ear, "You will burn that sermon up before you have been in the ministry twelve months." The Sabbath teachings which are carried into the week are those which treat of every day wants and every day duties—which meet the Christian, and tell him how to grow in grace and holy living—which soothe the afflicted with gospel consolations—which tell the young how to shun daily temptation, and the aged how to prepare for death—which points the anxious inquirer to that cross beneath which he may quiet his aching heart. And the simpler these teachings, the better. A discourse which a minister would not be willing to read to his children and domestics, with a good hope that they would understand it, is not usually a safe sermon to take into the pulpit. "It takes all our learning," said Archbishop Usher, "to make truth simple."

4. Another excellence of the preacher, of whom I am writing, probably was that he seldom went beyond his "thirdly." Neither will we; so we will close with the remark once made to Dr. Green by a poor woman of his parish. "Mr. Green," said she, "what do you think is the great business of the shepherd?" "To feed the flock, madam!" was his reply. "That is my notion too, sir, and therefore I think he shouldn't hold the hay up so high that the sheep cannot reach it."

WHAT SHALL I ASK?

OR,

A Benediction for a Babe.

BY JAMES MONTGOMERY.

What blessing shall I ask for thee,
In the sweet dawn of infancy?
—That which our Saviour at his birth
Brought down with him from heaven to earth.

What next, in childhood's April years
Of sunbeam smiles and rainbow tears?
—That which in Him all eyes might trace,
To grow in wisdom and in grace.

What in the wayward path of youth,
When falsehood walks abroad as truth?
—By that good spirit to be led,
Which John saw resting on His head.

What in temptation's wilderness,
When wants assail and fears oppress?
—To wield like him the Scripture sword,
And vanquish Satan by "the Word."

What, in the labor, pain, and strife,
Combats and cares of daily life?
—In His cross-bearing steps to tread,
Who had not where to lay His head.

What in the agony of heart,
When foes rush in and friends depart?
—To pray like Him the Holy One,
"Father, thy will, not mine, be done."

What, in the bitterness of death,
When the last sigh cuts the last breath?
—Like Him your spirit to command,
And up to paradise ascend.

What in the grave, and in that hour,
When even the grave shall lose its power?
—Like Him, your rest awhile to take;
Then at the trumpet's sound awake,
Him as He is in heaven to see,
And as He is yourself to be.

JACK OF ALL TRADES;

OR,

The Man for a New Settlement.

Parson Truman was a modest, unassuming person, who disliked mere outside display. He was a plain, practical man, a profound logician, and an earnest preacher. His knowledge was not bound by the limits of his library; his labors were not confined to the pulpit; his influence extended beyond the parish where he expounded the Scriptures. For he often had to serve as a lawyer, physician, teacher, priest, and confidential friend, in new settlements, where professional gentlemen are few and far between. At the time of which I write, he lived in a log-house. When at home, he spent a part of his leisure time in cultivating a little patch of ground which belonged to the parsonage. Sometimes his farm, as he called it, would be overrun with weeds, for his circuit extended several miles, and frequently kept him from home more than a week at a time.

One day he returned and saw the weeds standing among the vegetables, like Philistines among the Israelites, and he determined to uproot them and remove them from the land.

"Wife," said he, "I must go to work in the garden to-day. If any person calls to see me, tell them I am engaged. No person can see me while I am weeding behind that regiment of cornstalks."

He pulled off his best coat, which had been black, rolled up his sleeves, and commenced the task before him. Spear-grass, pig-weeds, sour plant, and the whole tribe of weeds, had taken possession of the little strip of land, and looked down contemptuously upon the stunted plants below them.

It was washing-day, and Mrs. Truman was hanging her clothes upon the linen line, when a sunbrowned woodman, with an honest face, inquired if brother Truman was at home.

"Yes, but he is engaged," replied the dear little woman, with a smile, for she could be good-natured even on Monday, while at work over the wash-tub. Think of that, ye Xantipes, who fret, pout, scold, and thump away, at such times and under such circumstances.

"If he is at home, I must see him a few moments."

"He left positive orders with me to allow no one to disturb him."

"I won't detain him from his studies but a short time."

"He is at work in the garden—"

The man did not stop to hear the conclusion of what she said, but unceremoniously walked through the gateway, and found the good man pulling up weeds as though they were unpardonable sins.

"Well, brother, I have found you at last. My horse is lame, and as you are something of a doctor, I thought I would ask your advice."

"Is he unable to walk or work?" inquired the dominie.

"He limps about on three legs a little. I wish you would step up to our place and see him."

"Well, I have agreed to marry a couple a short distance beyond your house, and I will call on my way to the wedding."

In order to make up lost time, the minister now worked harder than he did before he had been interrupted.

The first caller had not got out of sight, when a woman in dishabille, with her dishevilled hair streaming over her white face, came to the door, and asked if the Rev. Mr. Truman was at home.

"He is at home, but his engagements are such that he cannot be interrupted just now," observed his wife.

"Oh, dear me, what shall I do?" exclaimed the woman, wringing her hands, and weeping as though her sufferings were intense, and the minister was the only man who could relieve them.

"Wait a moment," said Mrs. Truman; "I will ask him if he can be seen."

"Husband!"

"Well, my dear, what do you want now?"

"Here is a woman—"

"I cannot help it."

"Hear what I have to say. Here is a woman in great distress; she is anxious to see you immediately."

The parson threw down a handful of wicked weeds so suddenly that a stranger might have supposed he was angry; but he was only a little excited. Perhaps he thought the transgressors he was driving from his piece of land ought to be cast into outer darkness, where they would be burned.

"What do you want, my good woman?" he asked, somewhat impatiently.

"Oh, sir! we have had such a row in our settlement! Mrs. Jenkins' child threw a stone, which broke Mrs. Sparkins' window, and Mrs. Sparkins told the child to clear out; and when Mrs. Jenkins heard of it, she came to Mrs. Sparkins' house, and told her she was no better than she ought to be; and Mrs. Sparkins declared she was; and then Mrs. Jenkins said she was a liar; then Mrs. Sparkins spit in her face; and then Mrs. Jenkins pulled her hair; and then Mrs. Sparkins tore the dress off her back; and Mrs. Jenkins cried murder, and I ran after you!"

"What were they doing when you came away?"

"Pulling hair, sir, and screaming murder!"

"What do you expect I can do in such a case?"

"Why, preach to them, and bleed them, sir, and stop them from going to law," said the frightened woman, who evidently had more faith in the minister than she had in the gospel.

"How far is your settlement from where the wedding is to be this evening?"

"About a mile, sir."

"I will call about seven o'clock."

The good man returned to his garden, where he had made but little progress; but as soon as he had got hold of the enemy, a teamster climbed over the fence, and asked him if he would be so kind as to put his shoulder to the wheel, and give him a lift through a mud-hole at the foot of the hill.

He could not put that off until he went to the wedding, so he went to work, and while they were jerking and pulling the load about, the wagon broke.

Mr. Truman had a box of tools and knew how to use them. The wagon was soon repaired, and the teamster went whistling and singing on his way, and the minister returned to his garden once more.

Just as he kneeled down before a bed of onions, as though he intended to copy the example of the Egyptians, and worship them, a loud rap was heard at the door. The minister could have wept without rubbing his eyes with the onions that stood unweeded there; but he resolved to be angry, and sin not.

The door was opened, and there stood the class-leader's son, anxious to see Mr. Truman.

Mr. Truman was called into the house.

"What do you want, my son?" inquired the minister.

"Father wants to borrow the Commentary on Luke, and the last newspaper."

"Wife, get them," said he; and then turning to the boy, he remarked: "The next time you want any thing of that nature, ask Mrs. Truman; she can get the books for you as well as I can."

It was now twelve o'clock; so the minister thought it best to take a "bite" of victuals. He sat down with his wife and child to a "picked up dinner." Before he rose from dinner an Irishman made his appearance, and modestly asked if the preacher lived there.

"Yes," was the answer.

"Will yer be so kind as to write a letther for me to the ould counthry?"

"By-and-by."

"May the blessed Virgin protict ye!"

"Take a chair."

"Will ye be afther doing it soon?"

"Right way after dinner."

The writing of the letter occupied at least an hour, and before he concluded it, a pretty little boy came to the house and asked for that "shot" he (the preacher) had recommended to his sick mother.

"Powder, you mean," said Mr. Truman, with a smile.

"Yes, sir, I meant to say powder," replied the lad, blushing to his temples.

"Now, husband," said the good-natured wife, "let me persuade you not to go into the garden again this afternoon. Stay in the house and mend the children's shoes, so that they can go to school to-morrow."

He finally made up his mind that it was better to sit there in the shade, than to stoop out-doors in the sun; so the shoes were repaired and the weeds left undisturbed.

When that job was finished it was time to prepare for the wedding. After performing the duties of barber and boot-black, he turned hostler, and saddling his pony, departed in peace, and went on his way rejoicing. He halted at Blake's barn, and examined the "lame mare."

"She has a nail in her foot," said he; "hand me a pair of nippers, and I will remove the shoe. Now, continued the preacher, while he stood there with the pinchers in one hand and the shoe in the other, "bathe the foot with salt and vinegar, keep her shut up in the stable, and she will be well in a fortnight."

After marrying the couple, he mounted his pony, turned his face toward the new settlement, and put up at the house of a Christian brother. He gave directions for Mrs. Jenkins, Mrs. Sparkins, and their friends, to meet him there. The house was crowded with the parties and their acquaintances.

"Mrs. Jenkins, did your boy break Mrs. Sparkins' window?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, Mrs. Jenkins, of course you are willing to pay for the window, are you not?"

"Certainly, I am."

"Mrs. Sparkins, did you spit in Mrs. Jenkins' face?"

"Yes; I did so when I was angry."

"You are sorry for it now, are you not?"

"Yes, sir, I am," she said, and then rubbed her eyes with one corner of her apron.

"Do you hear that, Mrs. Jenkins?"

"I do."

"Will you forgive her?"

"With all my heart."

"Now shake hands. God bless you. Good night!" Mr. Truman returned home another way, in order to see the sick woman, and give further directions respecting the powders. He found the medicine curing the patient, and had the good fortune to meet the class-leader there, who handed him the paper, and promised to return the Commentary in a few days.

When this useful, practical, accommodating man reached home, he was quite fatigued, but happy to think the day had not been spent in vain. One reason why he was anxious to weed the garden was, because there was to be a donation-party at his house the next day, and he did not wish to have his premises look as though he was slothful and lazy. After a delicious sleep and pleasant dreams, the donation-day arrived. Parson Truman helped his wife to provide for a large number of guests. He made the fire, pared the potatoes, churned the butter, watched the oven, scoured the knives and forks, and made himself generally useful.

Soon after sunset, the neighbors of different denominations began to arrive. Blake came with one horse hitched to the wagon; the mare that mated the noble animal he drove was too lame to travel yet. He brought with him a new cheese, a quarter of veal, and three or four bushels of corn. The sick woman sent her boy with a new dress for Mrs. Truman. The class-leader brought a side of bacon and a dollar in money. Mrs. Sparkins, Mrs. Jenkins, and the young window-smasher, came together and brought a beautiful quilt, the result of the united labors of the ladies in the settlement. The sewing was most neatly executed. It was originally designed for the missionaries at Liberia, but some one suggested that the climate of Africa was warm enough without quilts, so the sewing-circle concluded to present it to Mrs. Truman. By-and-by the teamster came with a wagon-load of people from his settlement. They came quite a distance, and brought money. Their united donations amounted to fifteen dollars. The Irishman was on hand. He said he had not much to give, but he would make himself useful by taking care of the horses of other visitors.

It was a pleasant evening; the moon sailed like a ship of light through the calm heavens. When tea was over, some of the company began to joke with the minister respecting the unweeded garden.

"Sure an' we might weed the garden by moonlight," said Pat.

The company took the hint, and went to work most cheerfully. Many hands made light work. When the party separated, the garden was in good trim, and every guest went home with a glad heart.

The Rev. Mr. Truman remained on that circuit two years, and at the expiration of that time a petition was sent to the Conference, praying that he might be returned; but it was contrary to the usages of that body to continue a minister more than two years at a time on the same circuit.

Joe Howel, the teamster, and Mary Simpson, who ran after the minister when the row happened in her settlement, became acquainted with each other at the donation-party; ever after that they attended meeting when Mr. Truman preached in Sparkins' school-house. Just before the good man, who was a universal favorite, left that circuit, he married this couple. Mr. Truman got up into notice by degrees, and has now charge of one of the best stations within the jurisdiction of the Conference. He has not forgotten how to mend a pair of shoes, repair a broken wagon, dispense medicine to the sick, help his wife about the house, and act a peace-maker when the hasty in spirit are disposed to quarrel. He is just "the man for a new settlement," or any other situation.

"THE LORD'S OWN TIME."

An individual, a few years ago, attended an inquiry meeting, and was asked whether he felt any anxiety for the salvation of his soul. He replied in the affirmative, and remarked that "he always thought he should be brought into the kingdom." His pastor asked him "when?" He replied that he did not know, but he supposed that it would be "in the Lord's own good time." Some ten years after, his former pastor met him and inquired, "Has the Lord's own good time for your conversion come yet?" He replied, "No." This person, living without hope and without God in the world, is one of a numerous class, who are waiting for God to come in his sovereignty, and arrest them as he did Saul of Tarsus. They live on contentedly in their sins, waiting for a miraculous display of Divine power. Under the delusion of honoring the sovereign grace of God, they live in the neglect of the commands of Christ. The inquirer above mentioned was asked by his pastor "how long it would be before the Lord's own good time would come?" He replied that he could not tell. His pastor told him, there need be no mistake on that subject. God now commandeth all men to repent. The present moment is the Lord's own good time. Behold now is the accepted time, and now is the day of salvation. The sinner cannot be justified in delaying a single moment to come to Christ. The Lord's own good time is the present. TRIAL HERE—JUDGMENT HEREAFTER.

That the sorrows which afflict the human race are the fruit of sin, cannot be questioned, if we believe the Scriptures; but that the sorrows of each individual are proportioned, in strict justice, to the amount of his own personal guilt, cannot be maintained with any consistency. Inspiration tells us of a class of persons who "are not in trouble as other men, neither are they plagued like other men;" and they are represented as men of very proud and oppressive dispositions. On the other hand, we are told of a class, who have "waters of a full cup wrung out to them;" and these are denominated God's people. The providence which orders things thus is inexplicable on the supposition that justice is meted out here. Justice requires that the proud and oppressive class should have the most trouble of the two. Here, then, is a fact, attested by the word of inspiration, which the theory of modern Universalism, that men receive their punishment as they go along, does not satisfactorily account for.

We would call attention to another fact; one which stares all community in the face. The system of American slavery dooms three millions of rational beings, made in the image of God, to a condition which is any thing but enviable, when compared with that of the white population of the country. They are bought and sold like cattle; they are beaten without mercy for the most trivial faults, and often for no fault at all; parents and children are torn asunder, and separated forever; every natural tie is violated in the most ruthless manner; nor can it be said that they possess in the eye of the law any personal rights at all. "Behold ye the tears of the oppressed, and on the side of their oppressors is power; but they have no comforter." Tell us, then, are these poor creatures of the African race sinners above all others? Is their personal guilt before God greater than that of the whites who oppress them?

Look, too, at the heathen world. Are the inhabitants of those countries where the light of Revelation does not shine, a happy people? Is it not among such people that the most cruel despotisms of the earth are found? Do not the masses groan under the rigorous exactions of those that are in authority? Are not their wars cruel, and their captivities marked with diabolical outrage? Do not the priesthoods of such countries impoverish the people to the utmost, impose upon them the most unrighteous exactions, and enforce the most sanguinary cruelties under the cover of religion? Do not the combined influences of the priesthood and of government well nigh extinguish all traces of happiness among them? It is needless to deny it. The facts are notorious, as attested by all travelers, confirming the testimony of Holy Writ, that "the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty." But tell us, is the personal guilt of these heathen greater than that of more highly favored sinners in civilized lands? It is unquestionably less. They sin not against so much light.

In the light of such facts, we wonder that men who believe in a God of justice, can repudiate the doctrine of a judgment to come. To our mind, the method of divine providence argues the necessity of that judgment. The misfortunes which we experience here, though caused by sin, are frequently brought upon us by the sins of others rather than by our own personal acts. The child suffers for the sins of his parents; the wife for those of her husband; the citizen for those of his neighbor, with whom he is more or less intimately connected. But this all takes place, not in proportion to the personal guilt of the sufferer; for in nine cases out of ten, the sufferer is less guilty than those who pass through life in comparative freedom from trouble. In fact, the word of God expressly declares, that the children shall not be punished for the iniquity of the fathers, nor the fathers for the children; but that every man shall be punished for his own sins. Deut. 25: 15. Ezek. 18: 20. But this declaration does not hold good in respect to the sorrows of this life; for it is certain that children do suffer for the sins of their parents here, and that we all suffer more or less for the sins of others. As it respects our condition in this world, it is established, that God "visits the iniquities of the fathers upon the children, unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate him." But when the time of rendering to every man according to his works shall come, every man shall bear his own burden. But as the providence of God develops a state of things in which we are made to suffer, in greater or less degree, for the sins of others, it is manifest that the judgment which vindicates his righteousness is yet to come.

But what can be the object of such a state of things as prevails in this world—a state in which the least guilty seem to endure the greatest amount of sorrow, while the wicked prosper, and "spread themselves like the green bay-tree!" Those who imagine that the dispensations of providence are all ordered so as to operate upon every one as a personal chastisement for his sins, or as a token of the divine approbation of his course, cannot answer this question. To them the book of providence is nothing but darkness Many professors of religion stumble here. Vexed and annoyed from day to day, crossed in their purposes, and afflicted in various ways, they inquire why it is thus with them, and wonder if they are such sinners that God must needs smite them in this manner. But let it be borne in mind, that the reason why God puts his people in the furnace of affliction, is not so much to punish them for their past offenses, as to give them an opportunity for exercising those graces which are necessary to the perfection of their character. And in general, the reason why he orders the dispensations of his providence as he does, is not to signify his approbation of the righteous and his disapprobation of the wicked, but to put both classes to the proof, whether they will walk in his ways or no.

Job was most severely dealt with in the providence of God. Stripped of his property, written childless, covered with a loathsome disease, so that life was a burden; and for what? To punish him for his sins? So thought his three friends who came to condole with him. But if the Scripture account can be relied upon, "that man was perfect and upright, and one that feared God, and eschewed evil." "There was none like him in the earth." And the opinion of his three friends, that his calamities were an indication of his wickedness, was not justified by the Almighty. But his severe afflictions gave him an opportunity to exercise that humble patience, that beautiful submission to the allotments of Providence, that entire resignation to the divine will, which furnished the most indisputable proof of the power and reality of religion; so that God was glorified, and Job benefited.

The beggar Lazarus, though counted worthy to be carried by angels to Abraham's bosom, after death, was made to receive "evil things" in this life. His hard poverty, and his bodily sores, constituted the school in which his heavenly Father saw fit to place him, that he might have opportunity to manifest himself an obedient child. On the other hand, sumptuous luxury was the school in which the rich man was placed, that he might have opportunity to use his riches in a way that would glorify God. Each was put to the test, but in a different manner. The one stood the trial; the other did not. But neither of them was dealt with after his sins, or rewarded according to his righteousness, in this life.

GLIMPSES OF MISSIONARY LIFE.

[A letter from Mrs. Carpenter to a friend in this city, has been placed in our hands, with permission to print any portion of it which we might deem of general interest. The view it gives of the trials of missionary life is so full and natural, that we copy a large part of it. May it serve not only to enlighten our readers on the subject of which it treats, but to excite them to earnest prayer on behalf of the heathen and of those who labor for the salvation of the heathen]

"Never before was my heart so full of home and all home affections. How often does the idea of some familiar face get possession of my thoughts, and ere I am aware, the tears gush to my eyes, and I have to hide my face until the sorrowful tide abates, and, like poor Joseph, I come forth to make the expletive but thrilling inquiry, 'Do they yet live?' But why ask that question? It cannot avail me to dwell upon earthly meetings and social gatherings. I feel that the swellings of Jorden must be met, before we again clasp each other's hands, look in each other's eyes, and converse face to face. Yet this is not a thought to give distress, while faith points to that meeting as just as certain, and just as real, as are the daily scenes of our passing life. Forgive me for being sombre. Your letter, so full of home events, is well calculated to foster such a state of feeling, for it seems to bring you all before me, and awakens all my sympathies for the absent, as well as all the living realities of the present." * * * *

"Do you know, I do not consider a domestic woman as a merely prosey or selfish being; and I am constantly becoming more and more convinced, that 'every wise woman buildeth her own house.' And now that I can speak experimentally on a rather extended scale, I still think a woman is never more useful than when she is making her husband so. Old-fashioned as our version of the Bible may be deemed, I do not think it wants revision on those points that delineate the character of a 'virtuous woman.' And my own opinion is, that even the wife of a missionary is never performing her duties more acceptably than when she is relieving her husband of all those little cares and anxieties, which might otherwise, as weights, impede his daily labors. Our friends at home have little knowledge, I fear, of the thousand little 'foxes' that are constantly 'destroying the vines' here. Perhaps they are thinking only of the work of preaching to the heathen, of making books, of instructing the ignorant, or of praying for the conversion of the dark ones around us. This is the great work to which we put our hands. But we are still human beings; our daily trials are much the same as at home; besides the addition of all those little annoyances of which Christians at home can have but a faint idea. I need not stop to tell you of the debilitating effect of climate, for that is a matter which is understood, at least theoretically, all over the world. Every year we seem less and less able to bear up against the enervating heats of summer, and the piercing chills of winter. In the summer, we cannot keep ourselves cool; and in the winter, it is next to impossible to keep comfortably warm. For instance, to-day [Dec. 21] your first impulse would be to laugh outright at the ado we make over the cold. There was a white frost this morning, but that has long since gone. The thermometer in my bed-room (the coldest room in the house) is at 43. Yet here we sit by our kitchen stove, with probably more folds of flannel about us, than you would put on in the coldest weather; and, with my feet on a hot 'kah-loo,' I am far enough from being really comfortably warm. So much for our ever-recurring days of heat and cold. Then come the cares of the household. We must eat and drink, as at home. Would that we could; but every thing seems combined to call into exercise our patience or our apathy. I do not say it in a fault-finding spirit, but as an agricultural fact; all the products of the soil seem so different from the same article at home—coarse, fibrous, unpalatable. The Chinese cook can prepare them to suit himself, but I sincerely do not believe we could live as they do. It may be very well in theory, to say the minister should fare no better than the common people among whom he labors; but alas! for the practicability of the thing. I assure you, no small part of a woman's labor needs to be given to these crude elements, which must, at all hazards, constitute the family fare. And then, when the matter is satisfactorily arranged in her own mind, she must either carry forward her own plans, or spend about as much time in overseeing and dictating to her cook, or subject herself to the humiliating alternative of having the whole matter turn out an entire failure. Perhaps you have learned how trying to the Marthas such an unfortunate state of things must be."

"Do not imagine I am becoming a scold. My good Leechong could testify to you, that in the more than four years he has been with me, I have never found fault with him but twice, and that almost broke his heart and mine too. But he is a rare case, and is generally known and understood to be, by all our missionary friends. He is often appealed to as the standard of prices by our friends around, and is frequently requested to buy for others, and his example plead as precedent in training the over-reaching but not over-scrupulous marketmen in other families. These constant appeals to him, in such matters, I consider among the strongest proofs of an acknowledged work of grace in his heart. How often I have occasion to speak and think of him, 'not as a servant, but above a servant, a brother beloved.' So that, in speaking of these trials of missionaries, I have less occasion to speak of my own trials, than of those incident to others. But I shall weary you with these details; so I forbear.

"One thing I meant to mention, which is the strange sort of decay, or decomposition, which seems to be constantly going on in every thing. A new house is only new for a short time. Repairs must be commenced with the first change of seasons, I believe, generally. Many an experiment is tried to make the roofs so tight that the first typhoon will not send in its floods, and sweep away all the plaster from the walls, laying bare the ceiling, and drenching the furniture. Houses which were new and beautiful when we came here, are many of them now torn down, or already rebuilt, to be perhaps in another five years replaced by others. We often ask ourselves, whether our own new houses are doomed to share the same fate; but doubtless they are, to a greater or less extent, thus adding another item to the list of our interruptions.

"But I must tell you some of my personal trials as connected with my missionary life. We have occasionally mentioned May-may to our friends, as one who gave us hope by her cheerful and open profession of belief in the truths of the Bible. We have not allowed ourselves to say much, because, from her extreme youth, we feared for her future steadfastness. A few months since I mentioned the death of her sister, Ah-too, and the reasons which I had for hoping that she died a Christian. I could but hope her death had an effect to strengthen May-may in her determinations to prove faithful. But trials have gathered thick around her, and I have more to fear than hope just now. She was the youngest of four children—the first, a sister, married, in good circumstances as to this world's goods, but a poor idolater. The second, a son, died several years before our arrival here, which so afflicted his mother with an affection of the brain, that it resulted in almost total privation of hearing, and eventually of reason. Since we have known her, she has been subject, during the autumnal months, to seasons of insanity, which would disappear in winter, and she would seem quite herself, until the annual return of the disease in the coming hot months. In her lucid intervals, she has seemed one of the most agreeable and lady-like of all our heathen friends, although, from her deafness, we could never converse much with her. Soon after the death of Ah-too, the father fell into a decline, and died in October, leaving the wife and mother in a sad state of insanity, which had commenced earlier than usual, and was already considered as quite incurable. Poor May-may was thus left a worse than orphan; without the means of support, and constantly distracted by the ravings of her maniac mother, now entirely uncontrollable, whose days were spent in wandering about, and nights in boisterous talk or noisy ways about the house. To add to this, she now took to smoking opium; would carry away and sell to obtain it, what she could lay her hands on, until May-may was obliged to lie down with whatever she could muster of clothing or the like fastened to her person, and the key to all their effects concealed beneath her garments. The father of her betrothed husband now kindly came to her relief, and supplied her with what was indispensable, until the time of her first deep mourning should have expired, when it was decided she must go to reside in his family. The betrothed husband is quite too young to marry, being only about sixteen, (May-may is seventeen;) so her only alternative is to take the place of a servant (slave is their term) until she assumes that of daughter-in-law, which will, in fact, be little if any improvement upon her present position. The day after to-morrow she is to take leave of her childhood's home forever. I am to pass the day with them. I shall feel this privation of her society all the more, as it is to be followed so soon, (in about a month,) by the marriage of Ne-may. A long time must elapse before etiquette will allow me to visit either. I must go as an invited guest, to see May-may; and as the family are all strangers, how is it to be brought about? Ne-may will call me as soon as ceremony will allow, perhaps in a month or two. Poor girl, she seems to feel this prospective separation very much. Never did her love for me seem so strong, her feelings so tender, or her attachment so exclusive. Yet I shrink from anticipations of the future. What sleepless nights and anxious days it brings me! I feel now as if I wanted to ask every Christian to pray, pray as you have never done, for dear Ne-may."

TRACT OPERATIONS.

Since the Anniversary of the American Sabbath Tract Society, in September last, the Board have had revised and stereotyped Tract No. 1, entitled "Reasons for introducing the Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment to the consideration of the Christian Public," and Tract No. 4, entitled "The Sabbath and the Lord's Day; a History of their Observance in the Christian Church." The tract known as "An Address to the Baptist Denomination from the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference," has also been stereotyped in size and style uniform with the others, and now makes No. 15 of the series. New editions of all of the tracts, and of the "Sabbath Vindicator," have just been printed, for distribution by colporteurs and others. The Board have also issued an edition of the tracts on a quality of paper and in a style suitable for binding. The volume includes the series of fifteen tracts, together with J. W. Morton's "Vindication of the True Sabbath," and Edward Stennet's "Royal Law Contended for" and "The Seventh-day Sabbath." These make a volume of about four hundred pages, printed and bound in a very creditable manner. Every Sabbath-keeper ought to have a copy, that he may loan or give to such as ask a reason for his faith and practice. Copies ought also to be supplied to every Sabbath-School and Bible-Class in the denomination, and one copy at least ought to be placed in the library of every College, Theological Seminary, or other Literary Institution in the United States. The Board are determined to prosecute this work just as fast as the means are furnished. As they have no collecting agent in the field at present, it is hoped that friends of the cause will not wait to be called upon personally, but will forward their contributions to the Treasurer, T. B. Stillman, of New York.

ANTI-SLAVERY CONVENTION.

An Anti-Slavery Convention, composed of a large number of well-known anti-slavery men from New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and other States, was held in Cincinnati during three days of last week. Rev. J. S. Fee of Kentucky was chosen President; the Vice-Presidents were George W. Julian of Indiana, Stephens of Indiana, Fred. Douglass of New York, C. C. Burleigh of Connecticut, and Russel Everett of Pennsylvania. A resolution was adopted by the Convention, to the effect that for the evils of Slavery a large portion of the American Church and Clergy are responsible. The subject of Colonization was extensively discussed, and resolutions were adopted, declaring that this is not less the native land of the Negro than the White Man, and that a proposition to remove the former to any other country is in every way as unjust and impudent as would be a proposition to remove the latter; that when the friends of colonization manifest the same desire to promote the interests of the negroes at home that they do abroad, it may then be time for the colored people to consider the colonization scheme; but for the present the colored people should turn a deaf ear to all colonization agents. Resolutions were also adopted, sympathizing with the cause of Hungary, and expressing surprise that Kossuth, with his knowledge of the natural sympathies of tyrants and oppressors with that kind all over the world, did not see the absurdity of going on a mission of liberty to slaveholders. Near the close of the Convention, Mr. Julian made a speech, in which he advocated a new political organization to overthrow the present Whig and Democratic parties, and a series of resolutions embracing that purpose was adopted.

Catholic National Council.—The Newark Eagle says that on the 9th day of May, the National Catholic Council will assemble at the Cathedral in Baltimore, and will be composed of thirty-two Bishops, (six of them archbishops.) Archbishop Kendrick will preside. Each bishop will be attended by a clergyman as theologian, making the council to consist of fifty-two members. Several hundred ecclesiastics will be in attendance, as well as a large concourse of persons, to witness these interesting ceremonies, many of which will be public. This is the last general council to assemble in Baltimore for ten years, though there will be provincial councils in all the archbishopricks every two years.

Colportage in Virginia.—The statistics of the American Tract Society show the following labors put forth for Virginia during the last seven years: Years of colporteur labor performed, 98; families visited, 99,314; number of volumes sold, 179,530, amounting to $42,382; volumes distributed gratuitously among the poor, 13,195, amounting to $10,550; meetings held or addressed, 6,922; families destitute of all religious books except the Bible, 13,806; and 7,392 families destitute of the Bible, of whom 5,577 were supplied. The number of families habitually neglecting evangelical preaching, was 8,382.

Books for French Children.—A late publication of the American Sunday School Union suggests a plan for supplying the children in France with books and libraries of a religious character. The plan proposed is to have a Juvenile Library prepared, consisting at the outset of only twelve volumes; the books to be prepared by competent and reliable persons in France, to be skillfully embellished and illustrated, and in all respects attractively appareled, and then to be examined and revised by the Board of Publication at Philadelphia in the same way with the other publications of the Union, and to be published by them. It is computed that of a library of twelve volumes four thousand copies may be published at an outlay not exceeding $1,500; the volumes (18mo) to average not less than 200 to 250 pages each.

The Fruit of Industry.—Rev. Albert Barnes, of Philadelphia, has recently completed his commentaries on the New Testament, by the publication of "Notes on the Book of Revelation." In the preface he gives some interesting details in regard to his manner of preparing these works, which have attained an aggregate circulation of more than 250,000 volumes. Having the charge of a large congregation, during the preparation of the works, he had no time to devote to them, except the early hours of the morning. The whole was accordingly written before nine o'clock in the morning, at which hour the author invariably closed his studies on this subject.

Missionaries Returning.—A letter from Shanghae states that Mrs. Taylor, a Methodist Missionary at Shanghai, is compelled to return to the United States on account of ill health. She sailed in the ship Adelaide, Capt. Cobb, with her two children and a Chinese nurse. Mrs. Boone, wife of Bishop Boone, returning for the same reason, is also a passenger in the Adelaide, accompanied by two children and a Chinese female attendent. Also, Rev. Dr. Bridgman, whose health is so shattered that, in the opinion of his medical adviser, his only chance for life was a long sea voyage. He is accompanied by Mrs. Bridgman and an interesting girl from Mr. B.'s school, and also by a son of Rev. E. W. Lyle, who comes here to be educated.

Schools for Sweden.—An exchange says that Jenny Lind came to America, pledged to give $150,000 to endow schools in her native country. Her object was to afford opportunities to girls of acquiring knowledge, to discharge efficiently the duties of wives and mothers, and at the same time to become imbued with the Christian spirit. Her pledge has been redeemed. The last installment of her munificent gift has been dispatched; and she may now calmly rejoice in the consciousness of having nobly accomplished a noble endeavor.

The Religious Interist in Boston.—The Boston Journal says that at a recent meeting of the Orthodox Sunday-school Union, it was stated by a teacher, that of his class of forty young men, over twenty had met with a change of heart during the past year. Very encouraging reports were also made of other schools. At the Union Prayer Meeting, it was stated by a gentleman who had taken much pains and care to get the facts, that during the last six months there had been in the thirty-three evangelical churches in Boston, one thousand and thirty hopeful conversions.

Shooting a Fugitive Slave.—A negro man named Smith, said to be a fugitive slave belonging to a Mr. Stansbury of Baltimore, was arrested at Columbia, Pa., April 29. During a scuffle which ensued, one of the officers, named Ridgley, drew his pistol and shot the negro through his body, causing instant death. The officer alledges that the act was committed in self-defense; but it is said that the Governor of Pennsylvania will make an immediate demand upon the Governor of Maryland for Ridgley, who must take his trial in Pennsylvania for murder.

Episcopal Delegation.—A large meeting of Episcopal clergymen was held in New York last week, for the purpose of selecting two Bishops to be present (on the invitation of the Archbishop of Canterbury) at Westminster Abbey, in London, on the 15th day of June next, when the close of the Jubilee of the venerable Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts is to be celebrated with great solemnity. Bishop McCoskry, of Michigan, and Bishop Delancy, of Western New York, were chosen.

The Door to France shut.—The decree issued by the French President, just before the meeting of the French Assembly, has disappointed those who hoped he would not become a persecutor of Protestants. By that act, the President extends to religious and all other meetings, those articles of the penal code which forbid meetings of more than twenty persons, without previous permission of the authorities, and punishes all who become members of "unauthorized associations."

A Sabbath Accident on the Isthmus.—A Panama paper states that a company of Italian emigrants, fifteen or twenty in number, met with a sad accident on Saturday, April 17th, in attempting to go on board the steamer Constitution. They were crowded into a small boat manned by natives, which swamped on the way to the ship, and nine of the Italians were drowned.

John G. Moss, of Buena Vista, Portage Co., Wisconsin, wishes to say to Sabbath-keepers who think of locating themselves in the West, that in the vicinity where he is settled there are beautiful burroak openings, and plenty of prairie and heavy-timbered lands, at which they would do well to look. He is 18 miles from the Wisconsin Pinery, and 12 miles from the county seat.

The Jew Question in England.—It seems that the Jew question is to be again agitated in England. The Court of Exchequer has decided that Alderman Solomons, being a Jew, had no right to take the Oaths as a member of the House of Commons. This decision will of course renew the agitation, which has stopped during the trial, and bring it back again into Parliament. The Tory Cabinet, it is supposed, will oppose any change which will admit Jews without virtually renouncing their religion. It will be queer to see Disraeli, himself a Jew, leading the attempt to arrest the liberal movement of which his own position is a triumphant illustration, and to exclude all who are faithful to the ancient religion of his race from the legislature of the country which has made him one of its ministers.

Dr. King in Greece.—Letters from Athens, in the German journals, state that the Supreme Court of Appeal of Greece had confirmed the sentence of an inferior tribunal, condemning Mr. King, the American missionary, to 15 days' imprisonment, a heavy fine, and expulsion from the kingdom, for having preached the Protestant religion in violation of the constitution. On this Mr. King addressed to the Minister of Foreign Affairs a protest against the judgment, both in his own name and in that of the American Government, from which he held, he declared, an official mission. He added, that he would not voluntarily obey the judgment. It was not known whether the Greek Government would expel him by force, but if it should, it was considered likely that the United States would take up his defense.

Kossuth spent last week in Massachusetts, visiting its principal towns at the invitation of the authorities. He was received with cordiality by the people generally, and, what was better, "material aid" was very liberally furnished him. The accounts of his tour indicate a deep and strong feeling of sympathy for him and for Hungary.

James H. Cochran has removed from Berlin, N. Y., to Plainfield, N. J., and requests his correspondents to address him accordingly.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, APRIL 26.

In the Senate, Mr. Seward presented a petition and joint resolutions of the New York Legislature for a ship canal around the Saut St. Marie. Mr. Cass offered a resolution of inquiry into the arrest and imprisonment in Austria of Charles L. Brace. The California Apportionment bill was passed.

In the House, a resolution to fix the seat of Government of Oregon at Salem, was passed. The Homestead Bill was resumed, and Mr. Bowie made a speech against it. He thought we should need all the revenue accruing from public lands, to pay the expenses of the Mexican War, the countless host of private claims, and to put the country on the defensive against its enemies in Europe. The House adjourned without vote.

THIRD-DAY, APRIL 27.

In the Senate, numerous petitions were presented, including one from Journeymen Printers praying for the establishment of a Government Printing Office. The Joint Resolution from the House approving and confirming the act of the Assembly of Oregon, fixing the seat of Government at Salem in that Territory, was taken up and passed. The Deficiency Bill was then taken up, and Mr. Seward made a long speech in favor of aiding the Collins steamers. He was followed by Mr. Underwood, who thought the $65,000 put down as the average expenditure on each trip could never be expended, if proper economy was practiced. He was, however, willing, in order to support the line, to vote for an appropriation of $25,000 a trip, but no more. He regarded the proposed allowance of $33,000 as exorbitant in the extreme.

The House spent the whole day upon the the Homestead Bill, the principal speakers being Mr. Stephens of Georgia, Mr. Smith and Mr. Hendricks.

FOURTH-DAY, APRIL 28.

The Senate spent some time upon the bill to create a Board of Commissioners for the examination and payment of claims against the United States, growing out of the conquest in California. In the course of remarks it was stated that Col. Fremont was recently arrested in London on liabilities connected with military operations in California in 1846–47. The subject was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The joint resolutions, re-affirming the policy of non-intervention, were taken up, and after remarks by Mr. Cooper, the Senate adjourned.

The House was occupied with Mexican Claims and the Freedom of the Public Lands, but without definite action.

FIFTH-DAY, APRIL 29.

In the Senate, Mr. Pearce of Md. made a long speech, defending the Administration from the charges made by Mr. Gwin of Cal., and others, in regard to appointments and operations on the Pacific side.

In the House, Mr. Walsh of Md. made a political speech, sustaining the Southern seceders, and predicting the election of Gen. Cass, unless the Whig party should immediately unite upon the Compromise platform.

SIXTH-DAY, APRIL 30.

In the Senate, the bill for the settlement of claims arising out of the military operations in California was passed. The Deficiency bill was then taken up, and Mr. Pearce finished his remarks. He was followed by Messrs. Gwin and Rusk, and the Senate adjourned till Second-day.

The House spent the whole day upon private bills, disposing of four or five.

SABBATH-DAY, MAY 1.

The Senate was not in session.

The House held a short session, in which the only subject considered was the bill for the relief of Osborn Cross. This gentleman is Quartermaster in the Army, and in 1842 his army was robbed of $6,600 in Treasury Notes. About half of this amount was subsequently recovered from the thieves. The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to credit him with the full amount.

European News.

The steamer Franklin, with five days later news from Europe, arrived at New York on the 27th ult.

Of political affairs in England there is nothing new, the Houses of Parliament having adjourned for the Easter Holidays.

The most interesting item in the news by the Franklin is the report that in April of last year two ships were seen on the top of an iceberg, off Cape Race, Newfoundland, and that the outward appearance, size and number of masts in these ships were the same as those of the vessels composing the expedition of Sir John Franklin. A thorough investigation of the report has been commenced by the Admiralty.

A melancholy shipwreck is recorded in a letter from Oporto, dated March 30: "A most lamentable occurrence, in the loss of the steamer Porto, (Portuguese,) has thrown this city into the greatest consternation; all her passengers (36 in number) having perished, and only seven of her crew saved. That unfortunate vessel sailed from this port on Sunday morning for Lisbon, and from some cause or another bore up again after being as far south as Figuerira, and on taking the bar last evening about 6 o'clock she struck on some rocks called the Forcados, inside the bar, when the anchor was let go, but somehow or other she drifted, and, not answering her helm, she got imbedded in a reef of rocks, where no aid could be sent to her; and night coming on, she went to pieces in a few hours."

Arrivals of gold from Australia still continued, and a great number of Mining Companies had been formed, and were forming, for working the gold mines in Australia. The shares of the California Gold Mining Companies, on the other hand, were temporarily discredited, and had fallen slightly in value.

In the event of the Crystal Palace being pulled down, it was understood that a London firm had offered £70,000 for the building, and intended to re-erect it in one of the suburbs for the purpose of a winter garden.

The Overland Mail, with dates from China February 27, Bombay March 15, Calcutta March 6, had arrived in London. The British Expedition against Burmah consisted of 6,000 troops, two ships of war and thirteen war steamers. Additional forces from China were expected. The departure of the expedition was to take place from Calcutta and Madras on the 19th March. The forces were to rendezvous at the route of the Cass or the eastern branch of the Irawaddy. It would probably proceed up the latter branch to avoid the resistance provided on the route by Rangoon, where 20,000 Burmese troops were assembled. The British forces had orders to advance to Proome. Parties of Burmese had ravaged the frontier villages.

The Palace of the Convertiti, at the foot of the Vatican, Rome, is being fitted up for the training and instruction of such Protestant clergymen as may wish, on their conversion, to take orders in the Catholic Church. The Pope has taken on himself, from his privy purse, to defray the expense of these pupils for the priesthood.

The Emperor of Russia, who is an invalid, is about to visit the waters of Schwalbach, in Nassau. In crossing through Germany, the Czar proposes to visit the courts of Vienna and Berlin.

The cultivation of Indian corn is very rapidly increasing in Germany. The house of Poppe & Co., which imports the seed from America, has this year received so extensive orders, that it has difficulty in effectuating them.

Two Days Later.

The steamer Niagura, with two days later news, arrived at Boston April 30.

The Arctic Expedition sailed on Thursday, April 15th. The ships comprising it are: The Assistance, Capt. Belcher; the Rescue, Capt. Kellett; and the North Star, Capt. Cullen; propellers Intrepid, Capt McClintock, and Pioneer, Capt. Osborn.

The story of the two ships seen in the iceberg being those of Sir John Franklin's expedition, is generally discredited.

Letters received in England from the African squadron, say that the efforts of cruisers have quite extinguished the slave trade in the Bight of Benin.

The New York clipper ship Witch of the Wave excites great attention, as she lies in the East India Dock, London, having made the quickest passage from China on record, with the most valuable cargo. She made the run from Canton to the Downs in 90 days. Her exploit is a subject of eulogy in the London Times of the 16th ult.

In France, forty-nine provincial papers have ceased to exist since the 2d December, in consequence of the excessive restrictions placed upon the press.

A great drought prevailed in the South of France.

The Intelligence Belge says that orders have been given to persons expelled from France not to enter Belgium.

The St. Petersburg Journals announce another victory by the Russians over the Circassians.

Four Days later.

The U. S. Mail steamer Pacific, with Liverpool dates to April 21, arrived at New York on Sunday last.

Parliament had re-assembled after the holidays. The Lord Chancellor introduced a bill to abolish the office of Master in Chancery. Mr. Herries had moved an inquiry into the operation of the act for regulating the Government of India.

In the Court of Exchequer, the case of Miller vs. Solomons has been decided. This was a prosecution to recover penalties from Alderman Solomons, a Jew, for having sat and voted in the House of Commons, to which he had been elected, without having taken the initiatory oath "on the faith of a Christian." Judgment was given against the Alderman; thus settling the point as to the eligibility of any but Christians to a seat in the House.

A new line of steamers for Maderia and the Coast of Africa, is announced to commence running on 1st September from Plymouth.

It is stated that another Searching Expedition is to be dispatched to Mellville Island, with the view of meeting that already in Behring's Straits.

Ireland is suffering from a severe drought. For the last 20 years no such continued drought is recollected at this season. It is much apprehended that a protracted continuance of it will seriously affect vegetation. In other respects farming prospects appear most promising.

The Central German Emigration Society complain that swindling emigration agents are inducing the Polish peasants of Posen to leave their homes by representing that "the King of America," has granted to Kossuth and Dembinski vast tracts of land for the purpose of settlement. The fate of many of these poor creatures, fleeced of their all before reaching the ports of embarkation, is pitiable.

California News.

Ten days later news from California, being to April 1, was received in New York April 27.

A Committee has been appointed at San Francisco, and is hard at work collecting money and provisions to forward by the first conveyance to the shipwrecked passengers by the North America, who still remain at Acapulco. In the mean time, some relief had already gone forward.

The amount of gold dust shipped from San Francisco and landed at Panama, during the month of March, 1850, as per records of the U. S. Consulate, was $1,028,569. For the same month of 1851, it was $2,015,774. During the corresponding month of this year, 1852, the amount shipped to Panama and San Juan has been $2,537,704, being an increase of $521,929 over last year, and $1,509,135 over the year before.

The Stockton Republican says, The agent of the Agua Frio Gold Mining Company—one of the most stupendous English humbug companies—has arrived in this country and traveled in search of the mine. He traversed the entire Mariposa region, but could not find the location out of which the company was to make a sudden and immense fortune.

One claim, of sixteen feet square, at Soldier's Gulch, has yielded, it is said, $30,000. It is estimated that there have been extracted from the gulch an aggregate of two millions of dollars.

The miners in the gulches around Agua Frio Creek and Mariposa River have been making good wages and occasional "lucky strikes" since the rain.

On Saturday afternoon, while a party of five or six persons were out on a sailing excursion just below Sacramento, the boat capsized, and before aid was procured one of their number, named Geo. Wagner, was drowned.

Several experiments are about to be made in San Joaquin County in the cultivation of sugar.

Earth boiling to extract gold is being adopted extensively in Calaveras.

Later.—The steamer Crescent City from Chagres, with California news to April 5, four days later, arrived at New York on Sunday last, May 2. She brought five hundred passengers, two millions of treasure on freight, and six hundred thousand in the hands of passengers. We give the principal items of news.

The winter, which was drawing to a close in California, had been quite a severe one. Great quantities of rain have fallen, and the rivers have been higher than ever known before. The mountain hights are buried in snow, and the summer will be one of full rivers, and hence of prosperous operations to the miners. The skies are now clear, and the waters are slowly falling back into the rivers' channels. The freshet was severely felt in the neighborhood of Monterey, and crops along the Salinas River are considerably injured.

The spring emigration from the cities to the mining interior has commenced. Parties are to be seen every day, in the streets or on the wharves, equipped for the mines.

The Calaveras Chronicle, Extra, April 1, contains an account of the arrest, trial, conviction and execution by the Vigilance Committee of a Mexican, named Carlos Eslava, for robbery, at that place on the 1st.

Emigration from South America, and particularly from China, is now quite brisk. Hundreds have left Chili within a month or two; many on account of the late revolution in that country—all to try their fortunes in the land of gold. Every ship from Hong-Kong brings a load of Celestials.

On the Klamath, a war of extermination has been declared by the whites against the Indians, and many aborigines have been killed. On the morning of March 12th a company of miners surrounded two lodges at the Indian ferry, and shot all the men, several squaws, and destroyed the rancho. The same scene was enacted at Indian Flat, two miles above—but one escaping, and he wounded. Some thirty or forty Indians were killed, and two whites wounded, one badly. The squaws and children are in Scott's Valley, mourning over their hard fate and begging for bread.

Burning of a Steamer—Twelve Lives Lost.—On the night of April 11th at about 1 o'clock A. M., when the steamer Pocahontas was descending the Arkansas River, and near Choctaw Bend, about 34 miles from the lower mouth of the river, she caught fire, and in less than an hour burned to the water's edge. It appears that some sparks ignited the cargo of 2,400 bales cotton, which were stored on the guards and reached the hurricane deck, and in less than 10 minutes the boat was completely enveloped in flames. The scene that ensued, on the alarm of fire being given, beggars all description. The heat and smoke drove the engineer and officers from their posts, and the boat was left to the mercy of the current. It was difficult or next to impossible to get any exit from the cabin, and when successful in this, the swollen river was the only chance for escape, and twelve passengers lost their lives, either in the flames or subsequently in attemptiag to reach the shore. This is the same boat that on her previous trip collapsed a flue, by which several lives were lost.

Died, at Charleston, S. C., on Saturday, April 24th, Rev. Bela B. Edwards, D. D., Professor of Sacred Literature in the Theological Seminary at Andover, aged 49 years. He was born in Southampton, graduated at Amherst, was several years editor of the Quarterly Register, and was one of the founders and editors of the Bibliotheca Sacra. He was a most laborious student and a man of vast learning. For many years his health has been precarious; he spent a long time in Europe, chiefly for its restoration, and was on a like mission to a southern climate when he was overtaken by his last illness.

Marine Disasters.—Newfoundland dates to April 25 have been received, from which it appears that in the gale of April 20, sealing vessels to the number of fifty to sixty were wrecked in the ice, with the loss of a large number of lives. A list of eighteen vessels, having full cargoes, is given. Portions of the crews of the shipwrecked vessels had been brought in, and about 100 who escaped to the Island, are there in a destitute and starving condition. Grants of £300 for their relief, had been made by the Assembly, and the vessels were about to sail to their aid. The disaster is said to be nearly equal to that at Prince Edward's Island last year. A vessel which arrived at St. John's April 27, reports that upward of a thousand shipwrecked sailors had reached Greensford.

SUMMARY.

Under the new arrangements made on the central line of Railroads in this State, last week, a train will leave Albany at 11, and connect with the Hudson River Road, so that passengers leaving New York at 5, will be at Schenectady at 12, Utica at 3, Syracuse at 5, Auburn at 6, Rochester at 9, Buffalo at 12. The time between Albany and Buffalo will be twelve and a half hours—to be shortened to ten hours, when, by the construction of the direct railway between Syracuse and Rochester, the distance is made less. About eleven trains will run over the Utica and Schenectady road every day.

The new system of telegraphic fire alarms was recently put in operation in Boston. Keys of the signal boxes will be placed in the hands of the engineers, and the police and watch. Some person near each box is to have charge of a key. In case of a fire, the mode of giving an alarm will be to go to one of the boxes within the district in which the fire occurs, and simply turn the crank which is within, and immediately the precise locality of a fire is known at the central office, and the alarm is then struck upon the nineteen bells connected with the telegraphic apparatus.

The wife of Michael Catt, a resident of Decker Township, in Indiana, was shot on Monday of last week, by her son-in-law, a Mr. Young, to whom she approached disguised as an apparition. Mr. Young had been previously conversing about the spiritual rappings, ghosts, &c., and it is probable was much excited on supernatural subjects at the time. Mrs. C., in a mood of merriment, showed herself to him, when he seized his gun and fired at her. The ball passed through her neck and occasioned death in a short time.

In New York, one day last week, Joseph Ryall was arrested upon a bench warrant, issued by Hon. Mayor Gilpin, of Philadelphia. The prisoner has been extensively engaged with a gang of rogues, for several years, in the manufacture of spurious coin, purporting to be genuine $5 and $10 gold pieces, issued by the U. S. Mint, which were freely circulated in many of the Southern and Western States, by his confederates.

The friends of the Nicaragua route to California are in high spirits with the result of the late trip by the Pacific and the Northern Light. The passengers by the former from San Francisco, it is represented, crossed the Isthmus in 36 hours. The time of the whole trip from San Francisco, including the stoppage at Havana, was 26 days, (running time reported 21 days,) the shortest passage, we believe, thus far, between San Francisco and New York.

Slight shocks of an earthquake were felt in various parts of the country last Fifth-day. At Baltimore and Washington they were quite manifest, and at Raleigh, N. C., they were sufficiently violent to put floors, windows and crockery in a state of active vibration. In some houses the oscillation of the floors was so great as to make walking difficult. The atmosphere was clear and pleasant at the time.

The Watertown and Rome Railroad is open for the conveyance of passengers and freight. It forms direct communication with all ports on Lake Ontario, the St. Lawrence River, or Bay of Quinte. The eastern terminus of the road is at Rome, Oneida County, where it forms a junction with the Albany and Buffalo Roads; and its western terminus is at Cape Vincent, on the St. Lawrence River.

The New England House, between Thames-street and Trinity Church, New York, has been purchased by two or three heavy merchants. They contemplate tearing down the present building, and erecting beautiful stores. It is said that the purchase money amounted to $3,500 per foot for the front on Broadway. The lots are 200 feet deep on Thames-street, so that the land sells for about $34 per square foot.

The Southern Ohio and Indiana papers report that most of the fruit—cherries, peaches, apples and pears—which had escaped the extreme cold of the past winter, has been destroyed by the late frosts. The Brookville (Ia.) Advertiser says the loss is incalculable, and the present impression is, that $500,000, or fifteen years of constant horticultural application, will not bring back the orchards to what they were last summer.

One of the flag-men, William Regan, stationed on the Hudson River Railroad, near Hudson, was killed in a strange manner the other day. He was holding his flag as a signal that the track was clear for the train going north from Hudson, and as the train passed, a stick of wood was thrown from the tender of the engine, and struck him with such force as to cause death in about two hours. His skull was fractured in a horrible manner.

A rather extraordinary marriage occurred at Floyd's Fork, Jefferson County, Ky., on the 15th ult., when, by Rev. Mr. Cunningham, Mr. Thomas Stafford was married to Polly Goben. The bride is 19, and the bridegroom 77 years of age. He weighs some 300 pounds, and is so fat as scarcely to be able to walk, and when in bed raises himself, or turns over, by means of pullies fastened to the ceiling.

The Oneida Cotton Factory at Yorkville, about three and a half miles from Utica, has been purchased for thirty thousand dollars by the New York Mills Company, whose present works are in the immediate vicinity. The property consists of the factory building, machinery, dwellings, and about sixty acres of land.

Kossuth and his suite were splendidly entertained at the "Burnet House," while in Cincinnati. The lessees of the hotel now demand of the City Corporation the payment of a bill of $5,000. The worthy fathers refuse to meet the demand. The dispute is still unsettled.

There was a sad accident last Sabbath. The express train from the East ran against a carriage, about six miles west of Canandaigua. A lady in the carriage was instantly killed: but a man and small child, who were also in the carriage, were but slightly injured—the child being caught by the engine-guard, and carried about sixty rods. The carriage was smashed to atoms. The man's name was Seth Swain, of Macedon, Wayne County.

A child two and a half years of age, in Boston, had been dangerously ill of typhoid fever for some days. The crisis had passed, and strong hopes were entertained that it might survive, when suddenly an organ grinder struck up a tune directly in front of the house. In a moment the child sunk back and died. It is supposed the sudden alarm caused by the noise of the organ was the cause of its death.

It is stated in the Cherokee Advocate, that John Ross, Chief of the Cherokee nation, has discovered an error in the survey of the State line of Arkansas. By this error, the Cherokees are deprived of a strip of land containing a population of 9,000 persons, worth $1,000,000, running the whole breadth of the State, from the Missouri line to Red River, and varying from 9 to 10 miles in width.

The steamer Prairie State, while rounding out from her landing at Pekin, on the Illinois, April 25, collapsed the flues of her larboard boiler, killing, scalding and wounding some 20 persons, mostly hands on the boat and deck passengers. The boiler blew out both forward and aft, and but for a quantity of hay stored in the engine room, the loss would have been much greater.

The rumor of the decease of Judge Coulter, of Penn., proves to be correct. He died suddenly, Tuesday night, at his residence in Westmorland County. Judge Coulter was in the prime of life, and a most able jurist. He was first appointed to the Supreme Bench by Governor Shunk, and was re-elected to it last fall. At the drawing of lots among the Judges, he drew the long term of fifteen years.

A mechanical prodigy has been on exhibition at Boston, nothing less than a huge machine, designed to facilitate the boring of the long-talked-of tunnel through Hoosac Mountain. It was taken to pieces to be transported to Greenfield. The cost of the machine with its steam engines is $20,000. If it proves a failure, half the loss falls on the contractors and half on the inventor.

The Muscatine (Iowa) Journal tells of a couple of romantic looking females who were, with their husbands, destined for Oregon. They were dressed in the Bloomer style, or rather in the Far West Bloomer style. This dress consists of a pair of pants made of cassinet, and loose sack coat, "all buttoned down before," with a standing collar, a pair of boots, gloves, and a Kossuth hat, with a fox's tail stuck in it.

Prof. J. Milton Saunders, of Cincinnati, writes to the editor of the Evansville Journal, that Mr. David Baldwin of New York, who is at present in that city, has quite perfected a telegraph which he says will revolutionize the system entirely. By it the news can be transmitted on one wire in opposite ways at the same time, and as rapidly as a person can talk.

The recent rapid advance in the Oil market has been attended step by step with a corresponding advance in every department of the Oil business. Every description has exhibited an upward tendency, until the subject has become one of universal interest throughout the country. Whale Oil has reached a price never before attained, while Sperm continues high.

The Report of the Superintendent of Public Schools in Kentucky, estimates the income for school purposes in the year 1852, at $133,000, and states that in a few years it may reach $140,000. The actual income of the fund for 1851, is set down at $123,000, and the number of children in the State, within the school ages, at 206,000.

An Equestrian Statue of Washington, in the costume of the period—the same as in Leutze's picture—is to be erected in this City. Fifty four gentlemen have associated to share the expense, but others are to be allowed to enter their names. Horatio Greenough and Henry K. Brown are the sculptors.

About 11 o'clock on Thursday night last a collision occurred near Susquehanna between two trains of passenger cars on the New York and Erie Railroad, but fortunately no lives were lost. The locomotive and first car of the train going west were furiously thrown from the track and completely wrecked.

A letter from her Britannic Majesty's Consul at New Orleans, states that the Legislature of Louisiana has passed an act amending the colored law of the State, by abolishing the penalty of imprisonment, and permitting free persons of color to come on shore with passports from the Mayor.

The new steamship Meteor was totally wrecked on Sunday, April 25, in Matagorda Bay. She struck on Cavallo Bar, breaking her steampipe, and the wind being strong at the time, she became unmanageable. The crew and 48 passengers were all saved, but the cargo will probably prove a total loss.

A frightful accident occurred to the Eastern train on the Michigan Central Railroad last week, near Leoni, about sixty miles from Detroit. In turning a curve in the road, a locomotive came suddenly upon the passenger train at full speed, smashing the last car, and injuring a number of passengers.

Thirty-five men from New York city recently passed through Cleveland en route for Minnesota. Of this number 28 are heads of families, representing, with those who have gone, and some one hundred still behind, 700 souls, who have selected a location on government land.

Thompson's Reporter says in relation to the Bank of St. Mary's, Georgia, "The southern telegraph announces the suspension of this Bank. John G. Winter, the owner of the concern, however, assures the public that he can and will ultimately pay all. We quote the notes at 25 cents on the dollar."

Banvard, the artist of the Panorama of the Mississippi River, which was exhibited a few years ago with such remarkable success in England and this country, has nearly completed his new painting of the Orient. It will be first produced in London.

Two men named Wm. Gleason and John Kirkpatrick were drowned in Boston harbor on Tuesday, in consequence of the upsetting of a small boat in a squall.

The population of Lower Canada, according to the late census, exceeds 900,000. The Upper or Western part of the Province, it is supposed, contains about the same number—and the total will be but little less than two millions of souls.

Gov. Hunt has respited Ann Hoag to the 30th of July. She was to have been hung at Poughkeepsie on the 7th inst. (for the murder of her husband,) but as she has just given birth to a child, she will be spared a while for the sake of her offspring.

The Rensselaer and Saratoga Railroad bridge, over the Hudson river, near Waterford, was recently destroyed by fire. It was evidently the work of an incendiary, for whose detection a reward of $1,000 is offered. The loss is estimated at $10,000.

Charles S. Palmer, one of the men charged with swindling in California tickets, who has been invisible for a while past, delivered himself up to the authorities, April 28, and was held to bail in the sum of $5,000. He professes an intention to meet all his obligations.

The first Salmon of the season was taken in the Penobscot on Tuesday, and weighed twenty-five and a half pounds. There was quite a rivalry among the hotel keepers to get the fish, and it sold for $48.

Twenty-one feet of snow has fallen in the Lake Superior region the past winter. Over Mud Lake, between the Detour and Saut Ste. Marie, the clear, hard ice is still three feet thick, most parts of the lake being frozen to the bottom.

The bill submitting the question of equal suffrage for colored persons to the people of Wisconsin, has been defeated in the lower branch of the Legislature of that State. The vote was 21 for the bill and 37 against it.

The Juliet (Ill.) Signal says that over seventeen hundred teams have passed that place for California within the last three weeks. Most of them were from Michigan and Northern Indiana.

It is stated that two-thirds of all the combs manufactured in the United States are made in Leominster, in Worcester county, Mass., some of the manufacturers employing upwards of fifty hands.

The first cargo of iron for the Egyptian Railway, now in course of construction under the superintendence of Mr. Robert Stephenson, was dispatched from Cardiff on the 26th ult.

The U. S. M. steamship Arctic Capt. Luce, sailed from this port at noon on Saturday for Liverpool, with the largest number of passengers taken out by any single steamer this season, having about 150 in all.

A bill has been reported in the Maryland House of Delegates, proposing to take the sense of the people on the propriety of prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in that State.

Seventeen journeymen printers have been indicted by the Grand Jury, at Harrisburg, Pa., for a conspiracy to prevent Andrew Dunn from working in The Telegraph office.

Messrs. Eli Bradley, Daniel Tull, and Richard Neal, were drowned by the upsetting of a small boat in the Nanticoke River, near Southampton, Md., on Sunday, April 18th.

Four ladies, Mrs. Ambrose, of Mississipi, Misses Palmer and Smizer, of Ohio, and Miss Brown, of New York, are attending the Eclectic Medical College at Cincinnati.

On and after the first of May, no notes of foreign banks can be passed in Delaware under the denomination of five dollars, under a penalty of ten dollars.

A telegraphic message was received in Boston on Saturday evening from Charleston, S. C., announcing the decease of Prof. B. B. Edwards, of Andover, Mass.

A dispatch from Apalachicola states that the ship Elizabeth, Carr, of Warren, bound to Providence, was lost—supposed near the bar.

The steamers W. B. Clifton and Chickasaw came in collision above Evansville, Ohio River, April 26, and the latter sunk immediately. It is reported about 20 lives were lost.

Lewis Morse, of Cincinnati, died recently, leaving a bequest of lands valued at about $75,000 for educational purposes.

MARRIED,

In Sacramento City, Cal., March 16, 1852, by Rev. Mr. Benton, Mr. ANSON BRIGGS, of Nevada City, (formerly of West Troy, N. Y.,) to Miss CATHERINE YOUNG, of Genesee, Allegany Co., N. Y., arrived at San Francisco March 14th, by steamer Tennessee.

DIED,

In Hopkinton, R. I., April 23d, Mr. JOHN BARBER, in the 86th year of his age. Mr. Barber, though not a member of any church, had testified to his faith in Christ by submission to the ordinance of baptism some years since; and in his last trial enjoyed a comfortable and firm hope of acceptance with God by His grace. L. C.

On the 16th of April, Mrs. ELIZABETH AYARS, wife of Elias Ayars, in her 62d year. She had long been a consistent professor of the Christian religion, and was at the time of her death a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Marlboro, N. J. She had, while in health, selected the seventh verse of the 39th Psalm—"And now, Lord, what wait I for? my hope is in thee"—to be used at her funeral, which took place on the 18, that 10 o'clock A. M., at the meeting-house at Shiloh.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Miscellaneous.

Moral Cosmetics.

Ye who would have your features florid,
Lithe limbs, bright eyes, unwrinkled forehead,
From age's devastation horrid,
Adopt this plan:
'Twill make in climate torrid,
A hale old man.

Avoid in youth luxurious diet:
Restrain the passions' lawless riot;
Devoted to domestic quiet,
Be wisely gay:
So shall ye, spite of age's fiat,
Resist decay.

Seek not in Mammon-worship pleasure,
But find your richest, dearest treasure,
In God, his word, his work, not leisure!
The mind, not sense,
Is the sole scale by which to measure
Your opulence.

This is the solace, this the science,
Life's purest, sweetest, best appliance,
That disappoints no man's reliance,
Whate'er his state;
But challenges, with calm defiance,
Time, fortune, fate.

Value of Book Farming.

The few thoughts I have expressed were suggested to my mind by an incident which, as it strongly exemplifies the value of "book farming," I will relate.

My neighbor D. and I were getting in a crop of Ruta Bagas. At the commencement of the year, when I renewed my subscription, I gave him an invitation to subscribe also. But no.. He was not going to fool away his money so. He could get along well enough farming from his own head without book farming it. In the course of the season I noticed an article in the Farmer, recommending the soaking of turnip seed for 24 hours in fish oil, to prevent injury to the young plants, by flies or bugs. I mentioned it to my neighbor, at the same time intimating that I should give it a trial. A little rivalry had existed between us, as our fields joined, and the more so, as he was fond of cracking his jokes at the expense of book farming. So this determination of mine only subjected me to a greater degree of his raillery. He'd show me turnips as were turnips, and beat me out of sight and hearing. Guessed I'd get satisfied with book farming.

However, I kept quietly on, determined to oil-soak my seed, knowing I could re-seed with the flat turnip if the ruta bagas should fail. In the character of the soil, our ground was very nearly or quite alike. His had been cropped once, while mine was newly broken. We both expended considerable labor and got the ground in high tilth. I had one and a quarter acres, which, after I had thoroughly harrowed, I burned every grub, root, stick and turf of grass, and removed the stones, raking the ground with a fine rake, after which I pulverized it with a heavy coal rake, to the depth of four inches. I soaked my seed in the oil for 48 hours, rolled them in ashes and sowed broad cast, covering lightly; after which I bestowed no more care upon them till they were harvested, as the ground was free from weeds. Neighbor D. sowed his in like manner, but without soaking, and one day earlier. They came up so evenly and looked so finely, he could but indulge in his old propensity again. "See, neighbor Tower, how nice they look—don't you think I'll show you the turnips over there." "Better wait and see what the bugs say to it," I suggested.

Mine came up also, in good order, the leaves showing a darker color, which they continued to sustain as they grew larger. Their growth was rapid, as they were not troubled by any insect whatever. But in the adjoining field of my neighbor, the little pests soon came in myriads, making riotous work, sweeping the tender things down so clean that hardly one was left. And what were, were so stinted they could not grow to any thing worth harvesting, and in fact my neighbor did not gather a single bushel—whilst I, after freely feeding six head of cattle all through the fall from the field, harvested nine hundred bushels, which, with those fed to the stock and not measured, must have made the yield nearly if not fully twelve hundred bushels.

By this time I had the laugh all on my side, and my neighbor became a strong convert to book farming. Before this he could not be induced to take any publication. But he soon became a regular subscriber for a half dozen.

Mr. Tower's method of harvesting his turnips was new to me. After turning in his cows to feed down the tops, he hitched his team to a three-cornered harrow, adding weight enough to make the timbers hug the ground, when he started it through the field. The wings would press the turnips out, and as the team advanced leave them in winnows, between which he drove with his wagon and flung them in. This method not only saved him a good deal of time, without injuring or bruising the turnips, but left the ground in fine order to receive a seeding of wheat, which I understood him to say he gave it.

How to Have Good Pie-Plant.

In such visits as we have made in the country abroad during the past few summers, we have been astonished at the samples of pie-plant we have seen. In this city there is no difficulty in getting it to give stems as large in circumference as the biggest sort of hoe-handles, and two feet in length to the leaf from the ground, and very little more difficulty in getting the same sized stems three feet in length, and no more in having stems fifteen inches in length, of the size of a man's wrist. On looking for such abroad for two seasons past, we have found some with stalks eight inches long, and less in size than a small man's thumb, called mammoth! while the common size was that of a young lady's finger. What is the matter? After all the talk about pie-plant, cannot we have any better than that? or did we not go in the right direction to find it? Pie-plant wants a very rich soil; it is a glutton of a feeder. It loves a soil filled with manure from the cow-yard, the horse-stable, the hog-pen, and the receptacle of night-soil. It wants, moreover, a deep soil. Its vast roots poke about in the mellow loam, with no fear of getting through into China, and then send out their runners in all directions, greedy as a tribe of caterpillars. It wants, moreover, a moist soil; and this it must and will have, or it will not grow to any size worth talking about, and the want of this is probably the reason why we have found such as we have described. Now, we have a project for growing it as big as it need ever grow, in the dryest of gardens, not without a little trouble, for no good thing comes on any other condition than that. Plant it in a rather shady situation, in an enriched soil; then cover the earth about the roots to the depth of two inches with straw, chips, or refuse. Next get an old barrel with both heads out, and plant it one foot from the pie-plant, on end. Then plant it full of manure, good and strong, so tightly trod together that it will take a while for water to go through, but not so tight as to hold it. Then each night pour into this barrel a pail of water; the soap-suds saved on washing days is the best of any. Follow this up through May and June, and if the leaves will not grow, it will be because they cannot. It is needless, however, to do this with the little spindling stuff commonly grown. Get the Victoria's Giant or Downing's Seedling to begin with.

A Hungarian Heroine.

On the night of the 2d of December, 1848, when all communication between Hungary and Austria had ceased, large armies on either side guarding their respective frontiers, the author was seated in the office of the Legation of the United States at Vienna, when his servant introduced a young female, who desired, as she said, to see him at once upon urgent business. She was a most beautiful and graceful creature, and, though attired in the dress of a peasant, the grace and elegance of her manner, the fluency and correctness of her French, at once denoted that she was nearer a princess than a peasant. She sat and conversed for some time before she ventured to communicate the object of her visit. As soon as the author perceived that in the exercise of the utmost caution she desired only to convince herself that she was not in error as to the individual she sought, he told her that, upon the honor of a gentleman, she might rest assured that the individual she saw before her was the diplomatic agent of the United States, at the Court of Vienna. Upon that assurance, she immediately said, "Then, sir, I am the bearer of a communication to you." She then asked, "Have you a servant, sir, in whom you can rely, who can go with me into the street for a few moments?" The author replied that he had no servant in whom he could rely, that he feared they were all in the pay of the police, but that he had a private secretary, in whom he reposed confidence, and who could accompany her. The secretary was immediately called; they descended together into the street, and in a few moments returned, bearing with them the rack of a wagon. This rack, which is a fixture attached either to the fore or back part of a peasant's wagon, and intended to hold hay for the horses during a journey, was composed of small slats, about two inches wide, and about the eighth of an inch thick, crossing each other at equal distances, and constituting a semi-circular net-work. As all these slats, whenever they crossed, were fastened together with either wooden or iron bolts, with our unskillful hands, an hour nearly was consumed before we could get the rack in pieces. When this was accomplished we saw nothing before us but a pile of slats; but the fair courier, taking them up, one by one, and examining them very minutely, at length selected a piece, exclaiming, "This is it!" The slat selected resembled the others so completely, that the most rigid observer, unapprised of the fact, could not have detected the slightest difference between them; but, by the aid of a penknife, to separate its parts, this slat was found to be composed of two pieces, hollowed out in the middle, and affording space enough to hold a folded letter. In this space had been conveyed, with a secrecy which enabled it to pass the severe scrutiny of the Austrian setinels, the communication addressed to the author by Louis Kossuth.

The mysterious personage, as intrepid as she was fair, who undertook the conveyance of this dispatch, at night, alone and unprotected, in an peasant's open wagon, in a dreadful snow-storm, through the midst of the Austrian army, when detection would have been certain death, was (as M. Pulszky has just informed the author) then a single lady, has since married, and is now the Countess M.

The Contrast.

"One of the pleasantest churchyards I know of, says the author of Local Loitering, is in the Isle of Wight; and many years ago I was sauntering among its graves, when I saw a lady in deep mourning, with a little girl, sitting on a tomb-stone. The former was reading a book to the latter, who was looking with tearful eyes into her mother's face. When they turned away from the spot, I saw that they had been looking on the tomb of the 'Dairyman's Daughter,' whose simple epitaph was engraved on the headstone. That lady was the Duchess of Kent, and the little child was the Princess Victoria, now a queen, on whose dominions the sun never sets. Perhaps the book the lady was reading, was the delightful and affectionate narrative of Leigh Richmond. Striking was the contrast in the condition of the sleeper and her who watched by her grave—the one a peasant's daughter in her dreamless slumbers, the other a child who, ere many years had passed over her head, was to take her place among the rulers of the nations! The humbler of the two had won her palm, and was wearing her crown, whilst the 'daughter of a royal line' was fated to endure the perilous splendor of dominion, and become the mother of more kings ere she should lie down in the vaults of Windsor."

English Luxury.

Few persons are aware of the wealth and splendor that surround many of the English nobles in their princely residences. The following are specimens:

The Earl of Spencer.

"The Earl of Spencer's homestead, about sixty miles from London, comprises ten thousand acres, tastefully divided into parks, meadows, pastures, woods, and gardens. His library, called the finest private library in the world, contains fifty thousand volumes. Extensive and elegant stables, and green-houses, conservatories, dairy-house, game-keeper's-house, dog-kennels, porter's lodge, and farm-houses without number go to complete the establishment. Hundreds of sheep and cattle graze in the parks about the house."

The Duke of Richmond.

"The Duke of Richmond's home-farm, at Greenwood, sixty miles from London, consists of twenty-three thousand acres, or over thirty-five square miles. And this is in crowded England, which has a population of sixteen millions, and an area of fifty thousand square miles, or just thirty-two millions of acres; giving, were the land divided, but two acres to each inhabitant. The residence of the Duke is a perfect palace. One extensive hall is covered with yellow silk, and pictures in the richest and most costly tapestry. The dishes and plates upon the table are all of porcelain, silver, and gold. Twenty-five race-horses stand in the stable, each being assigned to the care of a special groom. A grotto near the house, the ladies spent six years in adorning. An aviary is supplied with almost every variety of rare and elegant birds. Large herds of cattle, sheep, and deer, are spread over the immense lawns."

The Duke of Devonshire.

"The Duke of Devonshire's place, at Chatsworth, is said to excel in magnificence any other in the kingdom. The income of the Duke is one million of dollars a year, and he is said to spend it all. In the grounds about the house are kept four hundred head of cattle, and fourteen hundred deer. The kitchen garden contains twelve acres, and is filled with almost every species of fruit and vegetables. A vast arboretum, connected with the establishment, is designed to contain a sample of every tree that grows. There is also a glass conservatory, three hundred and eighty-seven feet in length, one hundred and twelve in breadth, sixty-seven in height, covered by seventy-six thousand square feet of glass, and warmed by seven miles of pipe conveying hot water. One plant was obtained from India by a special messenger, and is valued at ten thousand dollars. One of the fountains near the house plays two hundred and seventy-six feet high—said to be the highest jet in the world. Chatsworth contains thirty-five hundred acres; but the Duke owns ninety-six thousand acres in Derbyshire. Within the entire is one vast scene of painting, sculpture, mosaic work, carved wainscoting, and all the elegancies and luxuries within the reach of almost boundless wealth and highly refined taste."

The Orchard.

Plant among your trees; plant among your trees; then, after you have taken off your corn and other crops, you can look back upon your shorn field and see that, in addition to the produce secured, you have the growth on your three or four acres of trees. In a few years you will begin to take more from the trees than you do from the land. They will grow fast and bear generously, if the land is all kept mellow for the roots, and sufficient nutriment is spread broadcast for the roots to feed upon.

Now take the level piece, where you have your young orchard, and go carefully to work with a steady team—don't hitch on the steers for this job—plow the land deep and well, manure it, broadcast liberally, work the manure down into the soil with a small plow or large cultivator, plant, hoe, till, and your trees will grow like the corn itself. You will caution the boys in dropping the corn not to plant a kernel within six or eight feet of the trees. They need sun and air, and grow better when nothing else grows very near to them.

Just read what the late Mr. Cole says in the "American Fruit Book:"

"Mr. Moses Jones, of Brookline, in this vicinity, a most skillful cultivator, set 112 apple trees, two rods apart, and peach trees between, both ways. The eighth year he had 228 barrels of apples, and in a few years from setting the trees, $400 worth of peaches in one year; and the best of the story is, that large crops of vegetables were raised on the same land, nearly paying for the manure and labor. The tenth year from setting, many of the apple trees produced four or five barrels of apples each, the land still yielding good crops of vegetables."

Water-Melon Butter.

A correspondent of the Prairie Farmer presents the following method of using water-melons: I endeavor every year to raise a good water-melon patch. They are a healthy and delightful fruit, I think. I cultivate the ice rind variety; plant early in May, and again towards the close of the month, so that they may come in succession. When they commence ripening, we commence eating and use them freely during the hot weather.

When the weather becomes cool in September, we haul a quantity of them to the house, split them open, with a spoon scrape out the pulps into a cullender, and strain the water into vessels. We boil it in iron vessels down to syrup, then put in apples or peaches, like making apple-butter, and boil slowly, until the fruit is well cooked, then spice to taste, and you have something that most people will prefer to apple-butter, or any kind of preserves. Or the syrup may be boiled without fruit, down to molasses; which will be found to be as fine as the best sugar-house molasses. We have made of a Fall as much as ten gallons of the apple-butter (if I may so call it) and molasses, which has kept until May in fine condition

Hens.

According to Buffon, a hen properly fed and attended, will produce, in one year, upwards of 150 eggs, besides rearing two broods of chickens. Mr. Mount, of England, says that a well fed hen will produce from 170 to 175 eggs in a year. According to the latter estimate, 100 hens yield, in one year, 1500 eggs, and from 1000 to 1200 chickens. We find it asserted in an agricultural work, that an importation was made, a few years since, of hens from Holland. They were called "everlasting hens." They are small, lay every day, and their eggs are less in size and not so nutritive as those of the ordinary hen; still they are considered more profitable than the latter, as they lay twice as many eggs in a given period, and two of their eggs bring more than an equivalent in value for one of the other kind of hen's eggs. The profit of hens depends very much upon the food supplied them. Of all grains, buckwheat is unquestionably the best. It contains a large per centum of lime, besides much nutritive matter, and is regarded as a powerful promoter of fecundity in the gallinacea generally.

On the subject of preserving eggs, the Boston Cultivator has the following from a correspondent:—"Take a tight box and cover the bottom with a course of fine salt, about an inch deep, into which put as many eggs as you can pack, standing each egg on the small end, and not touching each other or the sides of the box, then cover them with salt, and so continue to pack them in layers, until you have packed enough to last one year, if you wish; then cover the whole with salt, put on the box cover to exclude the air, and set them in a cool, dry place, keeping the box right side up with care. Keeping the eggs on the small end prevents the yolks from adhering to the shell. Another method, which is about as good, is, instead of salt, use two parts of wood ashes and one of air-slacked lime, and pack in the same way; in either method, exclude the air as much as possible. To determine with the greatest certainty whether an egg is good or not, hold it to a strong light, and you can easily discover the slightest appearance of evil.

The Steamer Amazon.

A blue book has just been published in London containing the report of the Commissioners appointed to conduct the official inquiry into the loss of the Amazon, (under the Steam Navigation Act,) together with an appendix, in which is given the evidence taken by them. The Commissioners in their report furnish a condensed narrative of the chief occurrences connected with the catastrophe, and they sum up by stating that they are unable to account for the origin of the fire. The great loss of life which occurred they consider to have been owing to too great a desire of the superior officers to save their vessel, by prolonging their endeavors to subdue the flames, which soon became beyond their control, instead of enforcing order and arrangement at the first with respect to the escape of the crew and passengers in the boats; added to the mischievous effects of the cranes upon which the boats rested, and to the impossibility of stopping the engines after the engine-room had been abandoned. They recommend that all sea-going steam vessels carrying passengers should have fixed on board a fore-pump, either connected or unconnected with the engine, which can be worked by hand when the steam is not up; and that in large vessels these means of subduing fire should be increased by the use of a donkey, and additional fire engines. They point out also the propriety of guarding against fire in sea-going steamers, especially when passengers are carried, by protecting the surfaces of all soft, resinous, and easily ignited woods in the stoke-holes and engine-rooms of such vessels, or by causing them to be rendered fire-proof by subjecting the wood to a process by which it becomes difficult of ignition. The stowage of engineers' stores they strongly advise to be more carefully attended to than at present. The cotton waste, tow, and such like stores, to be kept distinct from the oils, tallow, and turpentine, &c., throughout the steam navy. The report concludes with an acknowledgment that the code of instructions issued by the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company to the commanders, is superior to any in the merchant service.

Kossuth's Idea of Glory.

An address that was presented to Kossuth while in New York, referred to the glory attached to his name. In reply, he said, "Allow me to remark, that I consider that the word glory ought to be blotted out from the dictionary, in respect to individuals, and only left in to nations. Whatever a man can do through the longest life which Providence may accord to him, with the strongest faculties which it is the happy lot of a few to possess, and with the utmost exertions of which man is capable—whatever a man may do in behalf of his country and in behalf of humanity, can never be even so much as duty calls; still less can it be enough to merit the word glory. Let to man be attached the word duty, and the word glory be reserved to nations."

Astonishing Feat.

In "Sir Charles Napier's Administrator of the Science," we find an account of a singular feat performed by a native:

"An Indian sword-player declared at a great public festival that he could cleave a small lime laid on a man's palm, without injury to the member; and the General (Sir Charles Napier) extended his right hand for the trial. The sword-player, awed by his rank, was reluctant, and cut the fruit horizontally. Being urged to fulfill his boast, he examined the palm, said it was not to be experimented upon with safety, and refused to proceed. The General then extended his left hand, which was admitted to be suitable in form; yet the Indian still declined the trial, and when pressed twice, waved his thin keen-edged blade, as if to strike, and twice withheld the blow, declaring he was uncertain of success. Finally he was forced to make the trial, and the lime fell open, cleanly divided; the edge of the sword had just marked its passage over the skin, without drawing a drop of blood."

LITERATURE.—Last month was held in Beyrout the anniversary of the Syrian Literary Society, when a discourse was delivered in Arabic by Butros Bistani, to an audience composed of Arab Mussulmans, Greeks, Maronites, Druses, Europeans and Americans. I speak of the Americans last, but I believe they were foremost in establishing a society of such an anomolous character, considering the former and even present character of the people. In the printed report of the session, the presence of the American Consul, and all the Consuls in Beyrout, was noticed. The objects of the Society are very general, embracing every thing connected with study and investigation by which the members can advance themselves and the people around them in knowledge connected with the Arabic language. They have commenced forming a library. I know of no similar Society in Turkey, unless one may be mentioned among the Armenian Catholics of Constantinople, and the newly formed Academy of Sciences at Constantinople. [N. Y. Times.

VALUE OF AN ACRE OF COAL LAND.—The Pottsville (Pa.) Mining Register, alluding to the cheapness of land in that quarter a few years ago, says now an acre of coal land is worth $1,000.

Many set down a higher figure. In the South Basin, (that is from the Sharp Mountain to the Mine Hill,) where we have all the thirteen veins, including red and white ash, the whole thickness of the coal is ninety feet. Allowing one half of this for fault and waste in mining, we have 45 feet, or 15 yards in thickness, of merchantable coal. There being 48,000 square yards to the acre, we have, by multiplying this number by the thickness, 72,000 square yards or tons of coal, which, at a rent of 25 cents per ton, brings $18,000. This is a fair estimate of the real value per acre, of our coal land, without exaggeration or embellishment. It is not strange, therefore, that our lands have and are still increasing so largely in value. In England, coal lands, not possessing near the intrinsic value of ours, sell at from one to two thousand pounds sterling per acre.

We heard lately repeated, says the Brookville American, the grounds of a strong and devoted attachment. A young and beautiful, but poor widow, was about to marry an old, rich widower. Her friends wished to know what she was about to marry him for. She feelingly replied, "Pure love—I love the ground (meaning farm, probably) on which he walks, and the very house in which he lives." There is a platonic love for you. There is none of your school-girl foolishness in that.

RUNAWAYS CAPTURED.—The two prisoners, Haycock and Winans, who lately escaped from the State Prison in New Jersey, have both been caught. The former became exhausted in traveling from Trenton to New Brunswick, and his feet being swollen so that he could not walk, Winans left him. Haycock remained hidden till nearly starved, when he crawled on his hands and knees to a farm-house and wished to be sent back to prison. He was a most pitable object, and after being relieved he was sent to Trenton. Winans intended to go on to his home in Orange County, N. Y., but was caught by a man named Randolph, to whom he had revealed himself in conversation, about seven miles this side of New Brunswick, and he was also sent back to prison.

CATCHING HAWKS.—A Michigan correspondent of the Genesee Farmer catches hawks with great facility by erecting a tall post near the poultry-yard, and in an open piece of ground, on which a smart steel trap is secured by a short chain. The intruder will be sure to take his stand there, to make his observations, and as soon as caught he should be quickly removed, so as not to alarm others. We should feel much reluctance in destroying this useful bird, so long as snakes, mice, &c., are nuisances, and would only resort to the above from necessity. We believe birds generally are the farmer's best friends; the only exception we make being in the case of those who despoil the fruit crop.

VARIETY.

The Boston Journal describes, as one of the curiosities of the age, an electric clock which has recently been completed, on an entirely new principle, and pronounced by scientific men to be the most perfect and simple of any. All wheel-work in the time-keeping part is dispensed with, therefore all friction is overcome. The time-keeping part of the clock is simply a pendulum, an electro-magnet, and two armatures. The vibrations of the pendulum break and close the circuit of electricity, while the combined action of the electro-magnet and armatures keep it in motion.

A couple of travelers lately took lodgings for about ten days at a tavern in York county, Pa., and fared sumptuously, drinking two or three bottles of wine daily. The last day a dispute arose about the speed of their horses, and they at last agreed to enter on the "profitable contest." The landlord was appointed judge, each being the rider of his own horse. When they were mounted, the judge, like those at the Olympic games, gave the word, one, two, three and go! Off they went, and have never been seen nor heard of since.

A suit has been brought in New Orleans, by Bishop Kendrick, late of Philadelphia, and now Archbishop at Baltimore, as the heir of Mrs. Campbell, late of Germantown, Penn., and the heirs of the late Mrs. Caroline Clark, wife of John Barnes of Philadelphia, to recover the immense estate of Daniel Clark, deceased, lately claimed by Mrs. Mary Clark, the widow of Gen. Gaines. Several other similar suits are being brought by different heirs, which will lead to a long, tedious and vexatious trial.

The Dnnkirk Journal says that the arrangements of the New York and Erie Railroad company for their second track are such that a distance of sixty miles between New York and Dunkirk will be saved. The saving is mostly gained between Lackawaxen and Lanesboro, and Elmira and Owego. When completed, the second track will be the shortest possible route by which the West can reach New York.

The Spiritual Rappers have begun their knockings or rappings in Mount Holly, N. J. The Mirror says a person of that neighborhood, who is a firm believer, gives out that he will soon convince the people of the truth of this new discovery. He intends to call upon the spirit of Sampson to move a two-story house for him, which he wishes placed about fifty yards from where it now stands.

A New York mechanic has recently completed the plan of a street-sweeping machine, which has been examined by those who are familiar with the construction and operation of those used in the English cities for that purpose, and by others who are competent to judge of its merits, and they pronounce it superior to anything they have ever before seen for the purpose for which it is designed.

The following is an illustration of the penny-wise and pound-foolish policy which some people adopt:—A man in Connecticut recently had a farm for sale, and was advised to advertise it; he said "he couldn't afford it; the farm was sold for $1,500. The purchaser bought it "on speculation," paid $2 for advertising, and shortly afterwards sold the same farm for $2,000.

A late Charleston (S. C.) Courier records a number of sentences in that city for theft. In one or two cases the sentence was to begin with twenty lashes, then a term of imprisonment, at the end of which he was to receive twenty more. In a case of forgery, the sentence was imprisonment, with six whippings at different periods, while serving out the sentence.

The Boston Post tells of a man in Maine who kept a grocery store, and when he sold a pint or a half-pint of rum, always put his thumb into the measure—an enormously large thumb—and at the end of twenty years' practice, he estimated that he had sold his thumb for at least $5,000, and had it left, after all.

A man can enjoy only that which he can use. If he possesses a thousand pounds, which he cannot use, it matters not, as to the benefit he derives from it, whether it be in his coffer or in the bowels of the earth. When his wants are supplied, all that remains is his only to keep, or to give away, but not to enjoy.

Every man ought to regard his fellow-man, or friend, as his superior, and treat him accordingly. Such feeling the real gentleman always has. "Let each esteem others better than himself," says an Apostle. This is the very soul of good manners.

The favorite steamer Commodore, Capt. J. M. Lewis, having been thouroughly overhauled and newly furnished, has resumed her trips for the season on the Stonington line.

The time fixed by the Receivers of the Commercial Bank, Perth Amboy, N. J., for the presentation of the notes and other claims against that bank, expires on the 22d inst.

All claims against the People's Bank of Paterson must be presented by the 15th of May.

THE FIFTH EDITION OF
New York: Past, Present, and Future,
BY E. PORTER BELDEN, M. A.,

HAS been issued by Prall, Lewis & Co. We have made arrangements by which we have bound, and will continue to bind, with each edition of the above the AMERICAN ADVERTISER, A Reference Work for Purchasers, containing the cards of merchants and manufacturers in every line of business. Price, including both of the works, 25 cts. and upwards.

The cheapest Almanac of the Season!

AMERICAN COMMERCIAL ALMANAC FOR 1852, containing, besides the astronomical matter, numerous statistical details relative to the government, judiciary, population, resources, and commerce of the Union—all the details of inland and foreign postage, and the Constitution of the United States in full, the latter of which usually sells for twice the price of the Almanac. Price—6¼ cts. single, $4 per hundred, $35 per thousand. PRALL, LEWIS & CO., Publishers,

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June of each year.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress
Rev. J. W. MORTON, } Assistants.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, }

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—
The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term, Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00
Monochromatic Painting	3 00
Oil Painting,	5 00
Writing and Stationery,	0 50
Vocal Music, Elementary,	1 00
Advanced Class,	2 00
Instrumental Music,	8 00

Use of Organ or Piano, $2 00 per quarter.

BOARD, in private families, per week, from $1 25 to $1 50; in clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter Term, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the common school branches, with daily lectures on "The Art of Teaching," Chemistry, Physiology, Laws of Health, School Laws, &c., &c. Tuition $2 50.

Students should not be furnished with unnecessary pocket-money, neither should minors be allowed to contract debts in the village. Either member of the Faculty will superintend the financial affairs of pupils placed under their care, by special direction from parents and guardians, if funds are furnished in advance.

FOREKNOWLEDGE.

In resuming the discussion on the question of "Foreknowledge," I desire to state, that in submitting the propositions as rules for the further discussion of this question, which appeared in the Recorder of April 22d, I did not design unfairness to the editor in regard to his reply, but, as stated, to avoid occupying an unreasonable space in any given number of the paper. I therefore hope that I may be permitted to withdraw those propositions—at least, in so far as they may be regarded in the light of conditions—thereby leaving the editor wholly unembarrassed in his replies. Also begging pardon for this perhaps ill-advised step in introducing them in the first place.

One of the main points of difference existing between Bro. Brown and myself, is stated in the Recorder of March 11, in the following words:—

"But Bro. H. seems to think it essential to liberty, not only that one should have the power to follow the inclination which he actually possesses, but that he should originate the inclination itself. In other words, that he should not only act according so his choice, but that he should choose according to his choice! If this is not his meaning, we are unable to determine what it is. The theory of Edwards, that the will is determined by motive, he appears to discard; and, in the language of the Arminian school, talks about the self-determining power of the will. Let us see what this self-determining power amounts to.

"King David walks upon the roof of his house at even-tide, and, casting his eyes in a certain direction, beholds Bathsheba washing herself. He has not as yet had criminal connection with her, but by a volition determines to do so. Now, the question is, was this volition self-determined, or was it determined by motive? Let it be borne in mind, that a volition is an act of the will, and an act is not freely performed unless it is performed from choice. But this choice is itself an act of the will, which must also be freely performed; and this implies a still previous choice. This previous choice is again an act of the will, which again implies a previous choice, and so on in an infinite series; the absurdity of which must be obvious. We maintain, therefore, that the aforesaid guilty volition of David, or that act of his will which looked to a criminal connection with Bathsheba, was not self-determined, but determined by motive, understanding by motive the whole of that which moves, excites, or invites the mind to volition, whether that be one thing singly, or many things conjointly. If this reasoning is not sound, will our brother have the kindness to point out its defects?"

I have made this long quotation, because so much of the matter of difference between Bro. B. and myself is contained in it, and that the reader may have both it and my reply to it at once before him.

The two propositions then are—

1. Volition is determined by motive.
2. The will possesses the attribute of self-determination.

Now, if my position was, that the will in its volitions acts independently of motives, the above absurdity might be justly chargeable to it; and I suppose the argument of Bro. B. is drawn up with reference to such a case. But this is by no means the opinion that I hold. With me it is a settled conviction, that the will can perform no intelligent action in the absence of motives. One might as well talk of seeing without light, or of hearing without sound. The thing is a nullity. But because the will cannot act without motives, must we necessarily come to the conclusion that motives cause volitions? It is essential to life, that the heart should beat; but who would argue that therefore the beating or throbbing of the heart caused life? As the beating of the heart is a condition of life, as light is a condition of seeing, and as sound is a condition of hearing, so is motive a condition of volition; yea, a necessary condition of volition. But a given volition is not the necessary result of motive.

Take the following case: A. enters a store; the occupant is not in sight; an opportunity is presented for him to possess himself of some desirable article by theft. Here is the motive. Motive, then, is first in order; second, volition; third, the action. Here, then, motive is necessary to volition, as a condition, but not as a cause; that is, there can be no volition without motive, but there may be motive without volition. Let us see.

Take the case of David and Bathsheba. No illicit purpose exists in David's heart until several circumstances occur, each essential to the other in order to the result contemplated. 1. He, by mere accident, sees Bathsheba washing herself; this is an appeal to his sensitivity. 2. The state of being tempted is the result. 3. An appeal is now made to the will, and here the whole matter must rest until its decisions can be obtained. Now, it is fully granted, that without the motive the will cannot act? But the motive being presented, must the will act? Is there a moral necessity in the case, so that the will must unavoidably consent to the motive presented? If so, wherein lay the king's guilt? 1. Did it lie in his being tempted? This was unavoidable, under the circumstances, from the nature of his constitution. 2. Did it lie in consenting to the proposition arising under the circumstances? But this was caused by the motive presented. 3. Did it lie in the presentation of the motive? With this he had nothing to do. Whence, then, did his guilt arise?

I trust that this view of the subject will relieve the question of the difficulties arising from the supposition, that the self-determining doctrine requires us to believe that we choose according to our choice.

On the question of "power" and "responsibility," I have only to say, that further reflection tends rather to settle upon me the conviction, that to assert that moral obligation can rest upon any creature whose actions are determined by necessity, is a self-contradiction.

In regard to the expression, that volition is not an effect, but a cause, of which Bro. B. says that it does no "credit to our philosophy," it perhaps was not sufficiently guarded. Yet I indulge the hope that, used as it was in this discussion, it was sufficiently understood; and as I have so fully defined what I mean by the freedom of the will, I will at present take no further notice of it. N. V. HULL.

ALFRED CENTER, May 3, 1852.

LAKE OF TIBERIAS AND DEAD SEA.

The "Lake of Tiberias" is a perfect contrast to the Dead Sea, because of its surpassing loveliness. Beautifully-rounded hills, clothed in exquisite verdure, shut it in; the clear waters glitter like silver in the sunbeam. The snowy summit of Hermon gleams away to the North; the battlemented city of Tiberias, at a distance, lends enchantment to the view. By moonlight the scene is quite as beautiful; besides those associations which throng the heart and hush the voice, that lift up the silent prayer, and make one feel, for the time, that he has lived long enough on earth.

It is very singular that the most recent Jewish work upon Palestine, that by Rabbi Schwartz, countenanced by the best scholars of his people, should so entirely misrepresent this neighborhood, as it does also some other parts of Palestine. According to him, "one sees constantly an active intercourse carried on, through means of small vessels, in which the inhabitants of the opposite side of the Jordan bring wood and other articles for sale to Tiberias." p. 46. This is pure fancy-work; they might do it if there were inhabitants, and if there were boats. But, except the roving Bedouin, there seemed to be no people on the eastern side of the lake—nothing, indeed, but silence and desolation—and no boat is to be found on the still waters since the "Exploring Expedition" purchased the last, which was afterwards abandoned on the Jordan, and is a total wreck before this time. Neither do the inhabitants of this once proud city need wood, as their climate is exceedingly warm, and a little charcoal is the usual article for lighting the pipe or boiling the coffee.

The lake is now found to fill a concave basin about one hundred and sixty-five feet of greatest depth; is about twelve miles long and five broad; delicious fish of five varieties abound, and it is still subject to violent squalls, as in the Saviour's time. Nothing has changed, save that silence and desolation have crept over the once busy scene, a desert succeeded to a continued cluster of villages and towns, the desolating despotism of thieving Arabs and lazy Turks, to the comparative protection of the Roman Empire. Tiberias, to be sure, has been greatly injured by earthquakes; the last one, in January, 1837, completely leveled part of the city walls, filled up some of the streets with ruins, and, by its destruction of life, gave the poor people a warning which they are not disposed to take. But the other places along the shore, Chorazin, Bethsaida, Capernaum, &c., are entirely gone. The site of some of them is greatly in dispute; half a dozen houses mark the location of Magdala, which recent travelers have fancied to be Capernaum; but Tiberias is the only town worth naming; and that, though handsome enough when seen from the hill-tops, is a mass of poverty, filth, disease, Jewish fanaticism, and melancholy ruin. It is one of the four Holy cities, Hebron, Jerusalem, Safet, Tiberias; and thousands of exceedingly wretched European Jews, who come here to die, are stripped by the government of nearly every thing they possess, and, through indolence, destitution, uncleanness, the debility and disease of the fevered atmosphere, and natural depression of spirits, no doubt die soon. We had taken pains to see the Jews in various countries, and had wondered every where at the miserable quarters into which they are crowded, the ancient rags in which they pretend to clothe themselves, and the wo-begone visages, which tell loudly enough how the iron of oppression has entered their souls. But, in Palestine, there is still a lower depth which these forlorn wretches have reached; more rags, filth, sickness, and despair. The cities they most frequent are especially disgusting; the quarters given up for their abodes are amazingly uncomely and uncomfortable. It accounts a little for the different views given by travelers of the same place, that Jerusalem, for instance, in the Christian portion, is as clean and well paved as it is disgusting and impassible in the Jewish. Only at Damascus do the Jews seem to live and flourish, decorate their persons gaily, fare sumptuously, occupy houses gorgeous as an oriental dream, and amass fortunes in the eyes of all men, with none to molest or make them afraid.

The Jordan was never thoroughly known until the laborious, successful, and really noble Expedition, permitted, rather than patronized, by our government. A British lieutenant, indeed, had attempted it, but his untimely death deprived the public of any benefit from his sufferings. Lieut. Lynch did his work so thoroughly, that it need not be done again; having answered the most interesting questions, sometimes indeed in a very unexpected manner.

As the Dead Sea has been reported to lie more than one thousand feet below the sea of Tiberias, the distance between these two expansions of the Jordan being but sixty miles, and no rumor existing of any great falls it was supposed that some serious mistake had been made in the reckonings. The American party settled this matter quite satisfactorily. The distance between the one "Sea" and the other is really only sixty miles, but the Jordan makes two hundred of it by its perpetual windings; and though it has no cataracts, it has continual rapids, so that a wooden boat could not live upon the uneasy stream, and the one purchased at Tiberias had to be abandoned because of its shattered condition. The Jordan is in fact a headlong mountain torrent, rushing sometimes twelve knots an hour, changing its winter depth of twelve feet into a summer shallow of sometimes less than three. The plain, through which this winding stream hurls itself down with such rapidity that bathers are every year washed away and drowned, called "the Ghor," is generally treeless, barren, and cheerless. Some naked and lofty mountains border the sides, and add to the desolate air, and frequently one bank is lined with an impenetrable jungle of canes, willows, tamarisks, and oleanders. The same romance-writer who enlarges upon the busy boating of Galilee, finds here delicious arbors, vocal with melody, gay with rainbow-hues, "as if laid out for a pleasure-garden by the hand of man." It is unaccountable that a person could have lived many years in Jerusalem, and written thus of a region only twelve miles distant. The immediate banks, where the "swellings" of the Jordan still take place, not enough, however, to be called an overflow, and very little like the inundation of Egypt, are an inaccessible wilderness; at the time of our visit still moist to the feet, destitute of bird or flower, and resolutely forbidding any entrance. Back of this fringe of a Mississippi wildness, comes the wide plain, exceedingly productive where it is watered, and unspeakably dreary where it is not.

The Dead Sea voyage was not so entirely one of discovery as the descent of the Jordan, by Lieutenant Lynch. Lieutenant Molyneux, whose idea was formed at the same time with that of a kindred officer of another hemisphere, had made the exploration, and almost immediately died from exhaustion. But many facts of interest are now for the first time the property of the public. By an examination made of the waters after his return, our officer discovered that no vestige of animal matter existed in this singular lake; though wild ducks are sometimes seen floating upon its molten sea, and fish are often brought down by the Jordan, and there is nothing to prevent creatures from flying across if they would.

The different reports made by different travelers, regarding the density, sliminess, and taste of the waters, are readily explained by the vast change which the sea undergoes from winter to summer. When the Jordan pours in its fullest flood, and evaporation is very slight, of course its peculiarities are greatly diminished; and again, in the latter part of summer, when the supply of fresh water is so small, and the action of the sun so intense in this stony furnace, the strongest language which has been employed could hardly be accused of exaggeration. Even in the winter the waters were more unpleasant than any liquid medicine which I remember, and a book dropped in accidentally never afterwards became dry. The metal boats of the American Expedition were kept constantly polished, and were very much worn by these leaden waves, whose roll in a storm seemed like the stroke of heavy hammers. In bathing, it is almost imposible to keep the feet down, because of the uncommon buoyancy of the water, and horses frequently roll over when they attempt to bathe, and are not a little troubled by the unusual condition of things. An oily, prickly, burning, and very disagreeable sensation is experienced for some time after bathing; but the water itself has no smell, and the sulphurous odor, more or less perceptible according to the season, comes from "springs and marshes along the shore." Even in the coldest weather, the air in this sunken caldron is hot and suffocating. Travelers feel feverish and feeble; "the figure assumes a dropsical appearance; the slightest scratch festers;" and the American sailors "complained bitterly of the irritation of the sores whenever the acrid water of the sea touched them."

But the most noteworthy fact of this body of water, Humboldt declares to be without a parallel in the known world. The sea itself is more than a thousand feet lower than the Mediterranean, and must therefore be the lowest sheet of the kind in the world; but, strange to say, the northern half is sunken nearly thirteen hundred feet below the southern portion, and, upon examination, discloses a ravine running from north to south in continuation of the Jordan; proving that the river once ran through this channel, but by some monstrous subversion of land is now arrested, and spread out in this molten bed. The southern part is supposed to have been the seat of the guilty cities of the plain; but if so, these sinks of hopeless sins were far less extensive and less splendid than is commonly supposed. The figure of the sea is more uniform than is generally represented, and its dimensions are about forty miles by nine. [N. Y. Review.

THE WAY THE COLORED PEOPLE MAKE DOCTORS OF DIVINITY.—In one of the Southern States there is a colored preacher of considerable note, whose eloquence is generally acknowledged, and who has more influence on a colored audience than any other man. He is generally called Dr. Jordan. He did not receive this title from any university or college, European or American, but from a meeting of colored class-leaders. Their white pastor, while meeting one evening with the leaders, observed that in conversation among themselves, they spoke frequently of "de doctor," and inquired of whom they spoke. One of the company replied, "We's 'cluded, bein's how brudder Jordan is de oldest man 'mongst us, and de most knowinest 'pon de Scriptures, to 'fer on him de doctor; so we calls him Dr. Jordan."

THE OLD PHILOSOPHER'S ADVICE TO A YOUNG ONE,

WHO WAS AFRAID TO SPEAK HIS OWN MIND ON A GREAT QUESTION.

Shame upon thee, craven spirit!
Is it manly, just, or brave,
If a truth have shone within thee,
To conceal the light it gave?
Captive of the world's opinion—
Free to speak—but yet a slave.

All conviction should be valiant—
Tell thy truth—if truth it be—
Never seek to stem its current;
Thoughts, like rivers, find the sea;
It will fit the widening circle
Of Eternal Verity.

Speak thy thought if thou believ'st it,
Let it jostle whom it may,
E'en although the foolish scorn it,
Or the obstinate gainsay.
Every seed that grows to-morrow,
Lies beneath a clod to-day.

If our sires, the noble-hearted,
Pioneers of things to come,
Had, like thee, been weak and timid,
Traitors to themselves, and dumb—
Where would be our present knowledge—
Where the hoped Millennium?

Where would be triumphant Science
Searching with her fearless eyes,
Through the infinite creation
For the soul that underlies—
Soul of Beauty, soul of Goodness,
Wisdom of the earth and skies?

Where would be all great Inventions,
Each from by-gone fancies born,
Issued first in doubt and darkness,
Launched 'mid apathy and scorn?
How could noon-time ever light us,
But for dawning of the morn?

Where would be our free opinion—
Where the right to speak at all,
If our sires, like thee mistrustful,
Had been deaf to duty's call,
And concealed the thoughts within them,
Lying down, for fear to fall?

Though an honest thought, outspoken,
Lead thee into chains or death—
What is Life, compared with Virtue?
Shalt thou not survive thy breath?
Hark! the future age invites thee!
Listen, trembler, what it saith!

It demands thy thought in Justice
Debt, not tribute, of the free;
Have not ages long departed,
Groaned, and toiled, and bled for thee?
If the Past have lent thee wisdom,
Pay it to Futurity. [Charles Mackay.

MINISTERIAL CHEATING.

"It is too bad!" said Uncle Eben, "it did not use to be so; this ministerial cheating is one of the degenerate signs of the times."

This remark of Uncle Eben was not the result of any previous conversation, but of certain processes of thought which had been going on in his mind. Mr. Jenkins had been sitting by his side some twenty minutes, reading a newspaper. If a friend called when Uncle Eben was busy thinking, a newspaper was handed him, and he was expected to read till his host should be ready to engage in conversation. That readiness was sometimes indicated by a question, but more frequently by a remark which led to conversation on the subject which occupied his thoughts.

"The expression you have used," said Mr. Jenkins, willingly laying aside the newspaper, "is equivocal. It may mean cheating of ministers, or cheating by ministers."

"That is true," said Uncle Eben.

"In which sense should it be taken?" said Mr. Jenkins.

"In both senses."

"Did no one cheat ministers in former days?"

"Not very often. I remember a story told me by my father, which shows how rogues used to feel towards ministers. It happened when my father was a small boy, more than seventy years ago. One of the minister's fowls had gone to one of the neighbors, and taken up its quarters there. A thievish fellow went one night and robbed the roost, taking, among the other fowls, the minister's. When he came to examine his spoil, he knew the one which belonged to the minister, and so he took him home, and thus brought himself out as the thief. In those days, my father said, if a man wronged a minister, he was looked upon as a sort of Algerine."

"Human nature is pretty much the same at all times. I suspect there were men then, as well as now, who would take the advantage of a minister, notwithstanding his black coat."

"There were not many Christian men who would do it in those days."

"There are not many Christian men who would do it now."

"There are a great many Christian men who do do it now.

"You are not wont to speak harshly of your brethren; I hardly know how to take you."

"You must take me as I say. To be sure, the word cheating may not be the precise word to express my idea. Cheating involves the idea of deception or trickery. The wrong which is often practiced on ministers does not often involve that idea. But that matters not. What I say is, that many Christian men are guilty of dishonesty towards ministers."

"That is a hard saying; I suppose you are ready to prove it."

"Of course I am, or I should not have said it. Let us suppose a case that will aid us in getting right ideas of this matter. You owe me, we will say, a hundred dollars. You engage to pay me on the first of July, and you put your name upon paper to that effect. In consequence of that agreement, I form certain engagements. The first of July comes, and I hear nothing from you. My engagements become due, and I must meet them as I can. Some time in the fall I go to you, and ask you for the money that was due on the first of July. You tell me you haven't it then, or it is not convenient for you to pay it then; that you will probably have it before long. The next week you take all your family a hundred miles to hear Jenny Lind, or you re-furnish your wife's parlor, or give a costly entertainment, for which the cash is paid. What sort of a man would it take to do such things? What would you think of yourself if you were capable of treating me in the way I have supposed?"

"I should not call myself an honest man."

"Certainly not. And if you knew I had suffered not only vexation but positive loss by your conduct; if you knew that my family had lacked bread on that account, you would not like to meet me."

"I should not."

"Well, now let me suppose another case. A parish—that is, the men who compose it, a majority of whom, to say the least, are professedly Christian men—invite a minister to settle with them, and promise to pay him five hundred dollars a year, in two equal semi-annual payments. The first payment becomes due; only a small part of it is paid. The minister made his engagements, in view of the promise made by the parish to pay him at a certain time. He has promised the merchant his money by that day. He cannot fulfill his promise, for a very obvious reason, but one which will not be taken into account by the merchant. 'Ministers,' he will say, 'should keep their promises. They can do no good unless they practice what they preach. Other men, it is to be expected, may fail to keep their word; but a minister, if he wishes to stand fair with the public, must keep his promises.'

"The minister bears the cold looks of the merchant for several months, when, hearing nothing about semi-annual payments, he calls on the treasurer of the parish. The treasurer is sorry that there is no money in the treasury. The mintster informs him of his embarrassments. He is now very sorry, and will speak to Mr. A. and Mr. B., who have not paid their subscriptions. In the course of a week or two he does so. Mr. A. tells him he must call on some one else. Mr. B. has a note to meet at the bank soon, and hence regards it as quite unreasonable that he should be called upon to pay his subscription while he has any thing else to pay. Mr. C. is called on; he has no money to spare—the reason he does not make known; the election is approaching, and he has made up his mind to serve his country in the Legislature, if he can secure an election.

"The year comes round, and the minister has received only about three hundred and fifty dollars of his salary. He has suffered in feeling, in reputation, and in purse; his family have suffered, if not the pains of hunger, the lack of some of the necessaries of life which they could readily have procured, had the parish, or the men composing the parish, fulfilled their written engagement. What sort of conduct do you call that?"

"It can't be called honesty."

"Certainly not Is there any difference in principle between the two cases supposed?"

"I can't say that there is."

"Very well. Then, if any cases like the last mentioned one occur, I spoke the truth when I said that some professing Christians are guilty of dishonesty towards ministers. Now I will ask you if any such cases ever have occurred?"

"I suppose they have—a good many of them."

"Then I have proved all you wanted me to prove."

"But the parishes do not look upon it in the light you do."

"That may be; but the question is, Do not I look upon it in the true light?"

"I think you do."

"Looking upon a thing in a false light, or calling a thing by a wrong name, does not alter its nature. A great many ministers have their influence and usefulness greatly impaired by the dishonesty of those who contracted for their services. It is in vain for Mr. A., B., and C. to throw the blame on the parish. The parish has no existence apart from the men who constitute it. In order that a man may be free from blame in the matter, he must promptly pay his own subscription, and do all he can to bring the parish to right action."

"I should now like to hear you explain ministerial cheating in the other sense."

"I have not got through with the first sense yet. There is another way in which ministers are cheated by some men who profess to be Christians. Once upon a time, a certain man put up two barrels of potatoes for two of his neighbors. One was sent to Squire M., and word was returned that thay were not satisfactory. The man hastened to see what was the matter."

"The potatoes you sent me," said Squire M., "are miserable things; there is not a large one among them; just look at them."

"Zeb has made a mistake," said the seller, "and brought you the wrong barrel. I meant this barrel for Mr. ——." He was about to add the name of his minister. The barrel was exchanged for the one filled with fine large potatoes. The small ones were sent to their original destination. No difference was made in the price. Why was it that the large ones were picked out for the squire, and the small ones for the minister? Because it would not do for the minister to complain. It was his duty to practice self-denial! That is a specimen of the way in which ministers are sometimes cheated by individuals."

"There are not many persons who are mean enough to treat a minister in that manner."

"If all the ministers who are now settled over churches should be called on to give testimony on this point, I am afraid it would take a pretty large volume to record it. But now I will explain what I mean by ministerial cheating in the other sense. When a minister spends his time in idleness, or in some secular employment, during the week, and comes before his people on the Sabbath with a half-prepared, feeble discourse, he cheats them out of what they have a right to have. They promised him a certain sum, and he promised them the best products of his mind and heart; and if he wilfully fails to furnish them, he is guilty of dishonesty, the same in kind as that I have been speaking of, and much greater in degree. To withhold from men the bread of life due to them, is a greater crime than to withhold the bread that nourishes the body. I consider it a great crime for a parish to wrong their minister; I consider it a greater crime for a minister to wrong his parish."

"I must say, in regard to ministers, as I did in regard to parishes, that ministers do not look upon it in that light."

"Some of them do, and all ought to. When, through the inability or neglect of a parish, a minister is obliged to turn aside for a portion of the time from his appropriate work, that is another matter; but when that is not the case, failure to give the whole mind and heart to the work of the ministry, to labor for the spiritual welfare of the church and congregation, is the worst kind of dishonesty!" OBLIGED TO PREACH EXTEMPORE.

The late venerable Dr. Ashbel Green, in giving some account of his mode of sermonizing, states that, in accordance with the advice of Dr. Witherspoon, he wrote carfully one sermon each week, and carried his notes into the pulpit. After a considerable period, "in order to gain time for reading and pastoral visitation," he wrote only the introduction, method, and some or the whole of the doctrinal part, with hints for the application. In one or two places he ventured in the evening to preach without any writing. "But," he remarks, "I was still afraid to venture to preach in the city without my notes, or without committing the whole of a written discourse to memory, which method I practiced for a short time. The city audience contained a number of educated men, besides many of the church-going members of Congress. At length an occurence took place, which compelled me to address the audience, that had excited my fears, without any time even to meditate on what I should say. This case was this. I had gone to the pulpit supposing that the notes of a sermon which I had carefully prepared were safely in my pocket, till the psalm which was sung before the sermon wanted only a single stanza of being finished. Then I discovered that my notes were not in my pocket, but that I must either have dropped them in the street, or left them in my study. In my confusion, I could not even find the text on which I had prepared to preach. When but a single line remained to be sung, I turned hastily to a passage of Scripture on which I had once spoken at Campington, and rose and discoursed upon it at the same length as was usually occupied by my other discourses. I considered this occurrence as intended in the providence of God to rebuke me for my 'fear of man, which bringeth a snare,' and to teach me that, with the Divine assistance, on which, in case of necessity, I ought to depend, I might preach without writing or deliberate meditation; for my hasty effusion I found was very acceptable to my people in general, and the most critical hearer in the congregation, as I was informed, said it was in my ordinary manner, except that the parts were not so closely connected as my discourses were in common. After this I did not hesitate (when I had not time to write) to speak to my city audience, as well as to that in the Nothern Liberties, without writing."

Many ministers have extempore powers of which they are not aware, having never ventured to bring them into exercise. Their usefulness would be much increased by fully developing and cultivating those powers.

DECEIVING CHILDREN.

On a certain occasion a physician was called to visit a sick boy, about twelve years of age. As he entered the house, the mother took him aside, and told him she could not get her boy to take any medicine, unless she deceived him.

"Well, then," said the doctor, "I shall not give him any. He is old enough to be reasoned with. I will have nothing to do with deceiving a child, lest I help him become a man that will deceive his fellow men, and finally deceive himself, and be lost forever."

He went to the boy, and after examining his condition, said to him,

"My little man, you are very sick, and you must take some medicine. It will taste badly, and will make you feel badly for a while, and then I expect it will make you feel better."

The doctor prepared the medicine, and the boy took it at once, and without the least resistance. He said also he would take anything from his mother which the physician prescribed, but would not take anything else from her; for she had so often deceived him, and told him it was good, when she had given him medicines, that he would not trust to anything that she said. But he saw at once that the doctor was telling him the truth; and when he took the bitter draught, he knew just what to expect.

Is not honesty with children, as well as with others, and in all circumstances, the best policy? How can parents hope to gain anything in the long run by deceiving their children?

"SATISFIED WITH MY DAY'S WORK."

A venerable office-bearer in the church recently deceased suddenly. In one of the social meetings held while his corpse awaited burial, frequent reference was made by his brethren to their loss of his consistent, godly example, as a means of warning to the unconverted, and of quickening and encouragement to Christians. One fellow office-bearer related the circumstances of a recent visitation of a district of the congregation. It was one in which the Lord seemed to prepare the way for their entrance into every family. Many were the occasions of affecting interest in the course of one day's labor. Especially did they enjoy much Christian communion with some of the poor of God's people, and the hearts of these servants of God overflowed with grateful joy. As the day was closing, and they were separating, the deceased remarked, in reference to the day's labors and rewards, "Well, brother, I am satisfied with my day's work."

The narration, we thought, did not fail to make a deep impression on the solemn circle. "He was satisfied," we imagined, each one said to himself. "Would he have said this if he had been selling flour all day?" Can we say that in view of our daily employments? Are we not depriving ourselves of much of the appointed rewards of Christian living, by refraining from such employments as brought our brother satisfaction? [Rel. Recorder.

ERRORS OF GREAT MEN.

Few men have lived to make more impression upon the world than Martin Luther. We scarcely know of a human character that so impresses us with the greatness, yea, the majesty of its elements, as does his. But in proportion as the good points in the character of a great man work for good, in the same proportion do his errors work for evil. And one error of Luther's has destroyed nations—that is, his error respecting the Christian Sabbath. In most things, Luther restored evangelical truth to its power upon the nations that felt its influence. But he failed in reality to give to those nations the Christian Sabbath, as a day strictly and exclusively devoted to religious uses. In his views of the Sabbath, which were to be so extensively diffused through Protestant Europe, he left a lump of the leaven of Popery, and gave the people more of a Romish than of a Christian Sabbath. Hence, the evangelical religion which he spread did not last. It has in a great measure died out, for want of a Sabbath.

Protestant Germany now presents a desolation, so far as the religion of the Gospel is concerned—a desolation which, in all probability, can be traced mainly to this source. For what would the religion of New England be, if her Sabbaths were made days of sports and dissipation? And in Germany the remnant of good men begin to feel that there has been a grand mistake, and that they must have a Sabbath, the Christian Sabbath, or all hope of reviving religion is vain.

We see, then, how much to be deplored is this one error of a great man. And we see how much to be dreaded and guarded against are all the errors of great men. Those of moderate men are of less consequence; for they do not exert so broad an influence, nor produce such wide-spread mischiefs. It is too common for the admirers of men of distinguished talents to regard their works with less scrutiny, in an assumption that they must be right of course. But the power which distinguished men wield is itself a reason why their errors should be watched with double scrutiny. For those errors take, from their high source, a breadth, a momentum in working evil, which makes it important that they should be early arrested [Puritan Recorder.

There is a spice of truth in the foregoing; just enough to make the whole seem like the very gospel, to those who never think for themselves, but not enough to give it that healthful character which would entitle it to general approbation. What is commonly called the Christian Sabbath is the Romish Sabbath, and the only thing to be regretted, in the case complained of, is that Luther did not discover the necessity of restoring the long-neglected Bible Sabbath. Had he done so, the Reformation would have assumed a consistent form, and its spread would not, in all probabilty, have been limited to those countries which embraced it at the time he lived. For it is notorious, that those countries which resisted Protestantism then, have continued to resist it to this day. They are Catholic still; and Protestantism has made no perceptible advances beyond the limits which bounded its triumphs in that age of agitation. There is a reason for this somewhere; and if any one can give it a better location than in the Papal traditions still clung to by the Protestant world, but rendered increasingly mischievous by wretched attempts to make them appear scriptural, we should like to see him undertake the task. We repeat it, that what is commonly called the Christian Sabbath is the Romish Sabbath; not originated, it is true, since the Bishop of Rome was by the Greek Emperor constituted Universal Bishop; nevertheless, that which is the very life and soul of Popery—the arrogated right to appoint festivals, and to lay men under the charge of sin for not observing them—was what called it into existence. It was not instituted by Christ; it was not enjoined by the Apostles; it was not acknowledged as the Sabbath by the churches in their pristine purity.

In regard to the Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment, Luther, no doubt, held precisely the same doctrine which is held by the writer of the foregoing article, namely, that it was a Jewish institution. The only difference is, that Luther had discernment enough to see just what the Fourth Commandment enjoined—that it enjoined specifically and definitely the seventh day of the week, to the exclusion of any and every other day—while the writer in question unwisely supposes it to enjoin the observance of a Sabbatic institution, without specifying the time any more definitely than as some one day in seven. But as the Sabbath of the commandment is the seventh day, and nothing else, those who hold the Puritanic view are as responsible for the evils which result from its desecration as Luther, Calvin, and the other reformers generally. If the Puritans could make it appear, by fair and honorable reasoning, that the Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment—the holy rest itself—is one thing, and the day on which it is to be observed quite another, we could have some patience with them when they set themselves up as the friends of the institution. We could feel that their earnestness to promote its better observance was worthy of being crowned with success. But does not the Fourth Commandment enjoin the the observance of a day? Is not that day specified as being the day on which God rested, in its weekly return? Is it not expressly declared, (Gen. 2: 3,) that the thing which God blessed and sanctified was the day—not the rest? Is it not all sheer sophistry, then, to maintain that the Fourth Commandment simply enjoins the observance of a sabbatic institution, as one seventh part of time, without regard to the particular day? Unquestionably it is; and Luther had sense enough to see that, if the law of the Sabbath were maintained, consistency required the Church to go back to the observance of the seventh day.

But there is a morsel of truth in the foregoing. We heartily endorse the sentiment, that evangelical religion must in a great measure die out, where no Sabbath is acknowledged. Men may theorize as they will, they may repudiate the Sabbath as a Jewish institution, they may reason themselves into the belief that Christianity recognizes no Sabbath, they may talk of the "Lord's day" as resting upon a foundation altogether independent of the Fourth Commandment; but the moment they being to reduce their theory to practice, they find that they must cease to have any particular concern for the interests of religion. Every good man feels that a Sabbath is indispensable to the spread of piety, as well as to the growth of his own soul in grace. As long as vital godliness animates his breast, no amount of sophistry can extinguish this feeling. Still, the theory itself, which repudiates the binding obligation of the Fourth Commandment, is bad; it is of injurious tendency. We could wish that those men of great minds and earnest hearts, such as Luther, Calvin, and their coadjutors in the Reformation, had been able to free themselves from it, and had restored to the world the Sabbath upon which the Creator put his blessing when resting from his works. Then had the line between Popery and Protestantism been more distinctly marked.

TIDINGS FROM JERUSALEM.

PHILADELPHIA. May 3, 1852.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

I send you for publication the enclosed "Report of the Agricultural Manual Labor School in Palestine," together with a letter of acknowledgment from Mr. John Meshullam, which reached my hands in thirty-one days from Jaffa to Philadelphia, and arrived in New York in only 28 days from the time of leaving Palestine on the 3d of April.

Yours in Christ Jesus,
JAS. L. BOYD, Agent.

Report of the Agricultural Manual Labor School of Palestine, in Bethlehem of Judea.

BETHLEHEM OF JUDEA, March 17, 1852.

To all our beloved friends in America who love Israel:—

Last evening, about 7 o'clock, our pilgrim family all arrived in this sacred and lovely village. After 4½ months by the way, our weary, homeless hearts, found joy and rest in the kind welcome of our precious brother and sister Meshullam. Words cannot speak the peace that overflows my soul, and the gratitude and praise I feel for the preserving love and mercy of God, who only has brought us through so many perils, and gives us this great deliverance. To gratify some who are looking with pious love toward Jerusalem, and for the sake of all those dear Christian friends who have been helpers in our labor for Jesus' sake, I will attempt—amid the bustle of unpacking seeds and tools, and arranging to pitch our tents, and the requisite and great domestic care—in brief and hasty retrospect to retrace some of the experience of the way.

On the 3d of Nov. 1851, after a few days' notice, we embarked from our pleasant home in Philadelphia, on board a fine sailing vessel for Marseilles. Our family (composed of seven adults and one little child) set out with one desire of pleasing God, by devoting our lives and all we possess to the good of his ancient people in Jerusalem; our design not being to preach our own righteousness, or any sectarian creed, but only to stimulate them, by a quiet, industrious example, to cultivate their own land, and win them by deeds of humility and charity to the knowledge and experience of the divine love of Jesus. Our young Captain kindly gave us the use of the ladies' saloon for family and Sabbath worship. He was a thorough and extensive reader of theology, and a high Episcopalian; he acknowledged that the seventh day is the true Sabbath, but supposed the great inconvenience of changing from the common error of the church, justified the commemoration of the first day.

Our provisions, the most of the way, were comfortable and sufficient; but near the close of the voyage we suffered considerable from the quality of food and water. Some of our number had protracted sea-sickness, but no serious illness ensued. Except one inconsiderable gale, near the American coast, we had fine pleasant weather, with short exceptions, all the way to France. The first two weeks the winds were fair; but afterwards they were almost constantly contrary, so that we were detained between the Western Islands and Gibralter nearly four weeks—also, after entering the Mediterranean—until at length, after 63 days passage, on the 6th of January, 1852, we arrived safely, and in improved health, in the harbor of Marseilles. Here we learned that other vessels that had left Philadelphia and New York several weeks before us, had not yet arrived; and while we remained, a number came into port much injured, having encountered severe cold and terrible gales on their way; and some had been over 100 days from the United States; so that we had great reason for thankfulness and praise for the preserving love that had spared us the severe terrors and dangers which they had encountered.

On arrival, the American Consul (Mr. Hodge) received us with particular attentions, having previously received a letter from Commodore G. C. Read, of Philadelphia, who had kindly commended us to his care, which provided us a very essential and timely assistance, as we had not time, at our departure, to obtain our passports from Washington, and they would have been indispensable to our farther progress. The Consul made them out free of charge, which we esteemed no small favor. We also received from his hand a very kind and most welcome letter from our dear Mrs. R., inclosing a most needful present from a beloved personal friend; also, one more from two Christain friends in Philadelphia, and another from a dear friend of Israel in England, congratulating us by the way. I need not say how refreshing were those words of love and encouragement, as we journeyed as strangers in a strange land.

My dear A. went immediately to seek our friend Pierre Hugeno, who so greatly befriended us when we were here before. He received him with the greatest affection, and came on board our vessel, and offered at once to do all in his power for us. We had paid $50 each for our passage to Messina, expecting from thence to proceed by steamer to Beyroot; but at Marseilles we learned that no steamer for Syria now stops at Messina. This caused us great trial and perplexity. Also, on inquiry for second class passage, and freight for our heavy amount of boxes, bundles, trunks, &c., on board of the line of steamers from Marseilles to Syria (a longer distance than from Messina) we found the charges so exorbitant that we were unable to meet the expense. In this extremity our friend Hugeno informed us, "that the commerce between Marseilles and Palestine had increased prodigiously within the last two years, and that many small vessels were constantly running to Beyroot, Caipha, and Jaffa." He then set about searching the harbor for such an opportunity for us. After much effort, he found a small French brig, going by way of Beyroot to Jaffa. After some consultation whether we dare hazard the prospective suffering of such narrow and miserable accommodations, our necessity compelled us to take passage at once. Our little brig had only part of a cargo, so that we had sufficient room in the hold for our goods, and for part of our number to sleep; the others sharing a very small cabin on deck with the Captain, his son, and the mate. Our expenses of changing vessels, harbor and custom fees, and our needful provisions for the voyage, (as we engaged to board ourselves,) with our passage and freight to Jaffa, amounted to about $200 in all. In this unexpected saving of our small means, our dear friend Hugeno was a kind and efficient agent. As he is connected with a banking house of considerable importance, he had influence with the shipping merchants in getting our cheap passage, and also with the prefect of police and customs, and spent several days in passing our goods through their difficult regulations, almost free of charge, pleading for us as a charitable mission. To effect this, he himself superintended and accompanied our baggage from one vessel to another, the jealous port-officers bowing in silence as his loaded lighter passed, without opening a single package. Their usual charge on every package passing through France, would have been a heavy tax for us, which his disinterested and efficient exertions saved us; while in the surprising interest and kindness which he manifested towards us, we recognized the hand of God.

After waiting a few days for a fair wind, we sailed from Marseilles on the 15th of January to Ala Centa, a small city about 20 miles south, on the French coast, where our captain's family resided. There we spent 5 days, and several times made excursions among its lovely fields, vineyards, and rocky hills, overlooking the sea.

On the 20th we set sail for Beyroot, with a fine wind, and found our little vessel (the Angelique) despite its unpainted appearance, to be a fine sailer, and, to our surprise, so sound in the bottom, that the pump was not used the whole voyage. After we passed Malta, a contrary wind and threatening weather came on, and our captain ran north to the coast of Greece, and anchored in a small cove surrounded by rocks and mountains crested with snow. Several half-civilized Greeks met us on the shore; they treated us kindly, and showed us a fountain of fresh water in a beautiful grotto among the hills. A shepherd brought a kid for sale, and others dry figs and wine.

On the 5th of February the wind changed, and we set sail again, but were alternately delayed by light and contrary winds and calms, accompanied by frequent rains. From our small knowledge of the French language, (as we had no interpreter,) our narrow limits, wet weather, and the rude, jovial ways of the crew—who loved our provisions better than their own—we experienced no small inconvenience in getting our necessary meals. I was also very ill for some days, and the time began to seem long; but through all these "light afflictions" the Lord preserved us, until, on the afternoon of the 15th of February, we descried the distant and lovely hills of Palestine, in the neighborhood of Sidon, some 20 miles south of Beyroot. Our hearts revived, and we were filled with love and praise to the God of Israel, who permitted his unworthy children to behold his beloved land of promise.

On the 17th, we anchored under Lebanon, in the harbor of Beyroot. Here we were detained, on account of the rains, eleven days, discharging a few articles of cargo. We had a letter from our friend Hugeno to one of the principal merchants, who kindly gave us another to his agent, (a French merchant at Jaffa.) Also, we found here the American Consul of Jaffa, and his educated brother, who assisted us before on our first visit. They expressed much interest in our behalf, and gave us an order to their agent in Jaffa, to assist us in every possible way on landing, and to store our goods in the Consul's magazine, until we proceeded to Bethlehem.

We were surprised to see the large number of fine buildings that have been erected since our first visit, in 1849; we were also assured, by merchants and sea-captains, that the commerce of this port is three-fold what it was a few years since, and that the increased buildings are extending back beyond the walls of the city.

After replenishing our provisions at the bazar, we sailed again toward Jaffa on the 28th; but soon after getting to sea, a contrary wind arose, and increased to a gale, when our cautious captain ran into the beautiful wide harbor of Caipha, under the shadow of Mount Carmel on the south, and the ruinous fortifications of St. Jean de Arc in the distance north. Here we were detained four days, and ourselves witnessed what God had begun to do to restore this favored site. The inhabitants treated us kindly; they appeared well fed and clothed, and many of them were fine looking persons. In the limits of the town there were many new stone buildings. I entered a long range of beautiful fields, covered in green, and every where interspersed with the fairest flowers, of the most exquisite form and color, and many varieties which we never see at home. Rich palms, and figs, and olives, grow on the plains; and flocks of goats graze on the green shrubs on the mountain side, presenting, altogether, from the vessel, a scene of most surpassing loveliness. The report we had heard at home of its commerce, was more than confirmed. Several vessels were loading with grain, though not in the season.

On the 4th of March, we sailed again, with a fine wind and beautiful day, and ran along near the coast, until, on the evening of the 5th, about sunset, the long-desired city of Jaffa appeared in the distance, on the low sandy shore; and in an hour after we came to anchor. In the morning early, several large, heavy boats conveyed us and our luggage safely to the land. It was a most solemn hour—a moment of interest, and devout awe and praise, that many hearts at home can more easily conceive than I can describe.

To our surprise, the French merchant to whom we had a letter, the Consul's Agent, and a crowd of Turkish officers, Arab citizens and porters, stood ready to receive us; the authorities, as we have since learned, having some weeks previously received orders from the Pasha of Jerusalem, through our dear friend Meshullam's request and influence with him, and also by the request of the British Consul, his friend in Jerusalem, that they should pass all our effects free from duty, without disturbing a package. The habit of the custom-house here has been to open and examine every article, to the great injury of goods, in the open air, in rainy and muddy weather. This request was granted, and, as we knew nothing of the arrangement, we were filled with joy and astonishment—the officers treating us with respect and kindness, overseeing that all was safely housed, without examination or fee. Also, through the French merchant's interest with the Convent, they opened two of their finest rooms for us. As there is no hotel in Jaffa, travelers often suffer much on this account. In about one hour, our heavy boxes of tools, bundles, trunks, &c., &c., were all carried on the shoulders of sturdy porters, and locked up in the Consul's magazine, and we were quietly seated on the comfortable divans of our apartments. We had anticipated great perplexity and trouble in landing, so that we seemed in a dream.

The Consul's agent immediately sent a messenger, with a note from us, inclosed in his official Arabic direction, to our beloved friend in Bethlehem, for advice as to our farther progress. As soon as he and other friendly persons had left us, we closed the doors, and returned most heartfelt thanks and praise to our invisible Leader and Preserver.

Our rooms and kitchen were furnished in Oriental style and convenience, and with our cooking and table furniture, we prepared our own meals. The Arabic words we had formerly learned proved a great help, as we were able to buy our provisions from the bazar without an interpreter. We bought fresh eggs 16 for a piaster (4¼ cents,) oranges of our common size 40 for a piaster, and others much larger 24 for a piaster, some of which weighed 1¼ pounds, and they were of a finer flavor than any we ever tasted before; butter 15 cents a pound; honey 6 cents a pound; figs 3 pounds a piaster; mutton 8 cents a pound, and bread 12; thin cakes, as large as a saucer, for a piaster.

Soon after we landed, the wind and sea arose, and a great storm of rain ensued, and our brig and many other vessels were obliged to put to sea, or run back to the safe harbor of Caipha, as Jaffa lies in an exposed position.

OBITUARY—REV. O. B. BROWN.

Died, on the 2d inst., at his residence in Washington City, the Rev. OBADIAH B. BROWN, in the 73d year of his age.

Probably not many of the readers of the Sabbath Recorder were personally acquainted with the deceased; but the high regard entertained by the writer for his memory, calls for something more than a bare statement of the fact of his death. Mr. B. was born in Newark, N. J., and at an early age became a subject of divine grace, and a member of the Baptist Church in that place, then under the pastoral care of Elder Charles Lahatt. Possessed of gifts which, in the judgment of his brethren, indicated his call to the gospel ministry, he was, after suitable preparatory studies, which he pursued chiefly under the instruction of Rev. Wm. Van Home of Scotch Plains, set apart for the work; after which he preached a short time at Salem, N. J. In the year 1807, he became, by unanimous call, the pastor of the First Baptist Church in Washington, then in its infancy, which post he continued to occupy till October 1850, when age and declining health compelled him to resign. He was several times elected Chaplain to Congress, was one of the founders of the Columbian College in the District of Columbia, and with Rev. Luther Rice, Rev. Dr. Staughton, and others devotedly attached to its interests, did much to raise and sustain it. From 1830 to 1833 he was extensively known throughout the country as Chief Clerk in the Post-Office Department, having charge of the Mail Contract Branch.

Mr. B. was a man of uncommon vigor of intellect and decision of character. Necessitated to pass his early life in mechanical pursuits, he did not enjoy the advantage of what is commonly termed a liberal education; but by diligent self-application he attained a superiority over many who boast of their diplomas. In the mathematics and exact sciences he had not many equals, and his tenacious and well-stored memory rendered him one of the most accurate of men in matters of history. The situation which he filled brought him much into contact with the public men of our country, and as his mind was not of a nature to slumber over questions which interested the public, he became thoroughly versed in the politics of the day, so that his views were sought with avidity by some of the most distinguished politicians.

As a husband, father, and friend, his character cannot be too highly eulogized. A residence of several years in his family enables the writer of this notice to testify, that he was a man of most affectionate disposition, and of great benevolence. As a pastor, he was highly esteemed, enjoying the confidence and affection of his people; and had not the feebleness of the flock over which he was called to preside, rendered it necessary for him to resort to other means of support, he would doubtless have stood in the foremost rank as a preacher. For the last six months he had been confined to the house the most of the time, but was not considered to be in a dangerous condition till within about thirty hours before his departure. He died in the faith of that gospel which he had preached to others.

DEATH OF A PHILANTHROPIST.

The venerable philanthropist, ISAAC T. HOPPER, died in New York on the 7th inst., after many weeks of bodily suffering, in the 81st year of his age. He was widely known for his zeal in the cause of the slave, the criminal, and all the children of poverty and want. It is believed that many hundreds of fugitive slaves owe their safety from the pursuer in good part to his strenuous exertions in their behalf. From the first organization of the New York Prison Association, until within the last few months, he held the responsible office of Chairman of the Committee on Discharged Prisoners, and performed its duties with a zeal and devotion rare for one at his advanced age. The following notice of Mr. Hopper's death, which we copy from the N. Y. Tribune, was written by one who knew him well, and was qualified to pay an appropriate tribute to his memory:—

In this world of shadows, few things strengthen the soul like seeing the calm and cheerful exit of a truly good man; and this has been my privilege by the bed-side of Isaac T. Hopper. Faithfully he had labored in his Father's service, and with a tranquil smile he welcomed the angelic voices, which he said were singing to him, "We have come to take thee home!"

He was a man of remarkable endowments, both of head and heart. His clear discrimination, his unconquerable will, his total unconsciousness of fear, his extraordinary tact in circumventing plans he wished to frustrate, would have made him illustrious as the general of an army; and these qualities might have become faults, if they had not been balanced by an unusual degree of conscientiousness and benevolence. He battled courageously, not from ambition, but from an inborn love of truth. He circumvented as adroitly as the most practiced politician; but it was always to defeat the plans of those who oppressed God's poor—never to advance his own self-interest.

Few men have been more strongly attached to any religious society than he was to the Society of Friends, which he joined in the days of its purity, impelled by his own religious convictions. But when the time came that he must either be faithless to duty in the cause of his enslaved brethren, or part company with the society to which he was bound by the strong and sacred ties of early religious feeling, this sacrifice he also calmly laid on the altar of humanity.

During nine years that I lived in his household, my respect and affection for him continually increased. Never have I seen a man who so completely fulfilled the Scripture injunction to forgive an erring brother "not only seven times, but seventy times seven." I have witnessed relapse after relapse into vice, under circumstances which seemed like the most heartless ingratitude to him; but he joyfully hailed the first symptom of repentance, and was always ready to grant a new probation. In fact, his last illness was brought on by over-exertion in efforts to encourage a poor fellow pilgrim, who had not strength enough to walk alone.

Farewell, thou brave and kind old friend! The prayers of ransomed ones ascended to heaven for thee, and a glorious company have welcomed thee to the Eternal City.

> "Thou henceforth shalt have a good man's calm,
> A great man's happiness; thy zeal shall find > Repose at length, firm Friend of human kind."

PRESBYTERIAN MISSIONS.

On Sunday evening, May 2d, Rev. W. W. Sprague, D. D., preached a sermon in one of the churches of New York, before the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church. His subject was the faith of Abel, which he contrasted with that required in prosecuting the missionary work. In the course of the evening's exercises, a statement was made as to the operations of the Board during the past year, from which the following facts were gleaned.

Finances.—The donations of the churches and individuals, the main reliance of the Board, are $8,051 larger than those of the preceding year. The receipts from all sources, including a balance of $136 from last year, amount to $143,459 06. Balance in the treasury, May 1, 1852, $586 58.

Missionaries sent out.—Thirty persons were sent forth as missionaries and assistant missionaries during the year, seven of whom are ordained ministers of the gospel. The wives of missionaries, the teachers, catechists, &c., are called assistant missionaries.

Indian Missions.—Among the Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, Seminoles, Iowas, Sacs, Omahas, Otoes, Chippewas, and Attawas; eleven ministers, and forty male and female assistant missionaries; four native assistants; 368 scholars under instruction, of whom 325 are boarded and clothed by the missions; church members reported, 93.

African Missions.—In Liberia, four stations, and at Corisco, near the equator; three ministers and six assistant missionaries—all persons of color but four; 159 scholars reported, of whom six are boarders; church members, 96.

India Missions.—Lodiana, Furrukhabad, and Allahabad, with ten stations. Twenty-six ministers, of whom two are Hindus; twenty-one American and twenty native assistant missionaries; scholars, chiefly in schools of a high grade, 1,914—of whom 117 are boarded and clothed by the missions; church members reported, 231.

Siam Mission.—At Bankok, two ministers, and two American and one native assistant missionaries.

China Missions.—At Canton, Ningpo, and Shanghae, ten ministers and eleven assistant missionaries; scholars, 206, of whom 87 are boarded and clothed by the missions.

Missions to Romanists.—Moneys have been remitted as in former years for the support of evangelists, colporteurs, &c., in Europe. In Hungary, Italy, Belgium, and France, $4,500 were thus expended last year.

Mission to the Jews.—Two ministers and a licentiate preacher are employed among their "kinsmen according to the flesh," in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore.

Summary.—Ministers, 54; assistant missionaries, 81; native assistant missionaries, 25; scholars, 2,647—of whom in boarding-schools, 535; church members reported, 440. Statistics of missions to Romanists not included.

CLOSE OF THE VOLUME.—Four numbers more will complete the eighth volume of the Sabbath Recorder. We wish the occasion could be signalized by a general payment of what is due for the paper. Within the past three months we have sent bills to all who owe us, so that they need be in no doubt as to the state of their accounts. Some, we fear, have taken these bills for receipts, and have made themselves quite easy about the matter. Let us correct their mistake by saying, that we do not in these days send receipts in the papers, that being unlawful under the new postage act, but we send bills, and acknowledge the money through the paper when it comes to hand. A very little trouble just now, on the part of those who owe the Publishing Society, would save a great deal of trouble to those who manage its business.

Another thing which ought to signalize the close of this volume, or the beginning of a new one, is a special effort, on the part of the friends of the Recorder, to increase the number of its subscribers. There are always more or less changes and discontinuances at such times; and as it is found inexpedient to send traveling agents to the different sections of the denomination, the only way to keep the subscription list good is through the efforts of local agents and friends of the cause. If each subscriber who has the interest of the paper at heart, would give some practical proof of that interest, by forwarding one or more new subscribers, the service would be most acceptable. We hope that many may be found to act upon this suggestion during the ensuing month.

THE MAINE LIQUOR LAW.—This law, in its principal features, was passed in the Rhode Island House, on the 7th inst., by a vote of 47 to 23; and it passed in the Senate without division. In Massachusetts, also, it was adopted a few days previously, by a very satisfactory majority, and has, we believe, received the signature of the Governor. The Massachusetts law, however, has one inconsistency; it permits the manufacture of liquors, and their sale in quantities of thirty gallons or over, for exportation from the State. The Rhode Island Law goes into effect on the 19th day of July next. The Massachusetts law provides that it shall take effect on Saturday, the 19th of June, and that on Monday, the 21st of June, the people shall be called together and vote on the question, whether the law shall be suspended in its operations for one year, or continue in effect. If the vote is to suspend operations, the Governor is to issue his proclamation suspending the operation of the law.

METHODIST MISSIONS.—A meeting of the Board of Managers of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church was held of Fifth-day at the Mission Rooms, for the purpose of making appropriations for the various missions during the ensuing year. The appropriations for the year commencing with the first of April, 1852, are $200,000, as follows:—

Foreign Missions	$77,572 49
For German missions at home	39,000 00
For foreign population, other than German, Welsh, French, Norwegian, and Swedes	11,500 00
Indian Missions	11,250 00
Domestic Missions	38,300 00
Total	$187,622 49
Contingent for current expenses	7,377 51
Contingent allowed by the constitution	5,000 00
Total	$200,000 00

This is by far a larger contribution than any previous year. According to the reports of the Treasurer, the receipts up to the present time exceed those of last year by $20,000.

RELIGIOUS MEETINGS.—This is a great week for religious meetings. The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church is in session at Boston, the Catholic National Council at Baltimore, and the leading Benevolent Societies of the country at New York. In our next we shall endeavor to give the most important and interesting facts developed by the Reports of the National Societies for benevolent purposes.

DR. JUSTIN EDWARDS.—We are sorry to learn (says the Independent) that the venerable Dr. Justin Edwards, so long engaged in the cause of the Sabbath and of Temperance, is lying dangerously ill at his house in Andover. His disease is typhus fever; the physicians express but little hope in his case, and his death was hourly expected at the date of our last advices.

REVIVAL IN BROOKLYN.—Sixty persons were received into the Plymouth Church in Brooklyn on Sunday, May 2d, fifty of whom then made a profession of faith. It is stated that the religious awakening in that church has reached the members of the Sunday-schools and Bible-classes, about forty of whom are indulging hope in Christ.

DISSENSION AMONG THE JESUITS.—A correspondent of the N. Y. Times says that a great dissension and rebellion has recently sprung up among the Jesuits at Rome and Naples, not respecting any new religious principles, but in relation to a reform in the fashion of their hats, called by the Italians cappelloni. The younger members of the order have decided to wear three-cornered hats, as better adapted to the progress of the age. The elder fathers, condemning this innovation, as against the rules of the order, have protested, and go in favor of the large hats. Father Rhoothan, the General, has published an article in the Civitta Cattolica of Naples, ordering all the members of the Company of Jesus, young, middle-aged and old, to adopt three-cornered hats, threatening the rebellious with ecclesiastical terrors, and expulsion from the mystical and political order of Loyola. The Italian papers predict a probable schism among the Italian Jesuits. One party will be called "Protestant," and the other "Reformed and Three-cornered" Jesuits.

Union Theological Seminary.—The Directors of the Union Theological Seminary in this city have issued an appeal to the friends of the institution, soliciting subscriptions to a fund of $150,000, which is deemed necessary to free the Seminary from its embarrassments, and put it in a safe and permanent position. The Seminary has been in existence 16 years, and during that period has educated 314 ministers of the gospel, 90 of whom were from New England; more than 150 from New York State and City; 66 from other States west and south of New York, and 5 from foreign countries. It is essentially a Presbyterian institution, requiring from the Directors and Professors a declaration of belief in the Westminster Confession of Faith, and approval of the Presbyterian form of church government; but it is open, free of charge for tuition, to students of the requisite qualifications from any evangelical denomination of Christians, and its advantages have been enjoyed by Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Methodists, Baptists, and even in one instance by an Episcopalian. The present faculty consists of Rev. Edward Robinson, D. D., Professor of Biblical Literature; Rev. Thomas Skinner, D. D., Professor of Sacred Rhetoric and Pastoral Theology; Rev. Henry B. Smith, D. D., Professor of Church History; Rev. James P. Wilson, D. D., Professor of Systematic Theology; and William W. Turner, A. M., Instructor in the Hebrew Language.

The Magdalen Society.—The Nineteenth Anniversary of the New York Magdalen Society was held on Friday, May 7, at the Bleecker-st. Church, New York. Rev. Dr. Knox was called to preside; and, on taking the Chair, he briefly addressed the audience in behalf of the objects of the Society. The Annual Report was then read, and from it we learn that during the past year the average number of inmates of the asylum was 70. During the year 6 were dismissed at their own request, 10 were placed at service, 8 were sent to the hospital, 6 were expelled, 16 were restored to their friends, 2 were married, 4 united with the church, and 11 were hopefully converted. The Board of Managers give a very favorable history of their labors during the past year, and look with confidence to the future for a reward for their labors. The payment of the principal of the mortgage on their property, thus relieving them from the payment of a large sum yearly in the shape of interest, is a most fortunate circumstance, and the incorporation of the Society will enable it to extend the sphere of its labors.

A Preacher for Sale.—The following paragraph, from the N. Y. Tribune of May 7, furnishes a striking and instructive illustration of the workings of the "peculiar institution:"

"Rev. Thomas Strother, a Methodist clergyman and a Missouri slave, belonging to the estate of the deceased Luke Whitcomb of St. Louis, is now in this city, attending the General Conference of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, having hired his time for $10 per month of the estate, in whose behalf he is to be sold next year, if not previously redeemed. Any body who would like to give him $1 or so toward his freedom, and that of his wife and child, may enclose it to him through the Post-Office, or find him by inquiry during the sittings of the Convention in Bethel Church, Second-st."

Price Current of Negroes, &c.—There was a great sale of negroes and mules at Aiken, South Carolina, a short time ago. The Augusta Constitutionalist gives the following list of prices, which, it thinks, "may be interesting to the public:"—

97 Negro men—aged from 20 to 40 years—average price	$857
18 boys—ages from 16 to 18 years—average price	656
4 women, from 20 to 45	555
2 old men from 40 to 50	528

There were about 80 Mules sold—some of them very inferior—average price $95. The highest sale was $162—lowest $45.

An accomplished and handsome Woman for sale.—The following paragraph from the advertising columns of the National Intelligencer, Washington, shows how things are done at the capital of this "land of the free and home of the brave:"—

For Sale.—An accomplished and handsome lady's maid. She is just 16 years of age, was raised in a genteel family in Maryland, and is now proposed to be sold, not for any fault, but simply because the owner has no farther use for her. A note directed to C. D., Gadsby's Hotel, will receive prompt attention.

Home Work in Great Britain.—The larger of the Free Churches in Scotland make it a rule to raise as much for what is called the "sustentation fund," for the support of pastors settled over feeble churches, as they do for the salaries of their own ministers. The Congregational Union of England and Wales raise a yearly sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the support of weak churches of their body, or the propagation of their views in the country. These examples are worthy of imitation.

The Quaker Case.—The Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in the Quaker case of Earl et. al., Chief Justice Shaw, delivering the unanimous opinion of the bench, has decided in favor of the claims of the body of the Society against those of the few who separated from them in 1845, under an organization commonly known as the the Wilbur Meeting, and that the body of the Society in New England remains a sound and consistent body of the Society of Friends, and that their disciplinary proceedings had been regular throughout, and that those who separated from them have no claim to the property in contest.

Accident to Daniel Webster.—A telegraphic dispatch from Boston says that last Sabbath (Saturday) morning, as Hon. Daniel Webster, accompanied by his private secretary, Mr. Lanman, was riding from his home, in Marshfield, to Plymouth, the bolt connecting the forward wheels with the body of the carriage broke, letting the carriage down heavily. Mr. Webster was thrown out, striking upon his head and right shoulder. He was stunned, and for a few minutes insensible, during which he was carried into a house near by, and medical aid promptly procured. His injuries, though severe, were pronounced not dangerous.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, MAY 3.

Mr. Felch, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported adversely upon all of the petitions asking for a modification of the Bounty Land Law. The bill granting a pension to Ursula Cobb was taken up and passed. The bill granting land to Wisconsin, to aid in the construction of a railroad from Fon du Lac to Janesville, and from Milwaukee to the Mississippi River, was ordered engrossed. Mr. Rusk made a lengthy speech in support of a liberal policy toward the Collins Line of Steamers.

In the House, bills for the relief of Charles G. Hunter and Jane Irwin were passed. The House then proceeded to dispose of the vast amount of business which has for the last two months been accumulating on the Speaker's table. This included sixteen communications from the Executive Departments, some of which were laid on the table, and others referred to Committees. The question of paying United States officers, who neglect their duties, was briefly discussed; after which the French Spoiliation's Bill was looked at, and the House adjourned.

THIRD-DAY, MAY 4.

Nothing was done in either House, except the passage of the usual resolutions and adjournment, upon bearing officially of the death of Hon. Charles Andrews, member of the House, from Maine.

FOURTH-DAY, MAY 5.

In the Senate, Mr. Mason spoke at considerable length on the proposed appropriation to the Collins steamers.

In the House, the Public Printing occupied a good portion of the session, but nothing worthy of especial note was effected.

FIFTH-DAY, MAY 6.

In the Senate, the Deficiency Bill was the principal topic up, and Mr. James made a long speech in favor of aid to the Collins steamers. He was followed by a discursive debate upon the same question, in which many of the friends of the measure participated.

In the House, after some unimportant business, the Homestead Bill was taken up. The amendments to the first section occupied the whole day, and most of them were rejected. As it now stands, this section provides that every man or widow who is the head of a family and a citizen of the United States, shall, from and after the passage of the act, be entitled to enter, free from cost, one quarter section of vacant and unappropriated land, or a quantity equal thereto, to be located in a body, in conformity with the legal subdivisions of the public lands, and after the same shall have been surveyed.

SIXTH-DAY, MAY 7.

The Senate first took up and disposed of some unimportant private claims, and then went into consideration of the Deficiency Bill. Mr. Cass made a long speech in favor of aiding the Collins steamers, and several other Senators spoke on the subject.

In the House, the Committee on Public Printing made a report, which was laid over till Fourth-day. Private bills were then taken up, and thirteen were reported to the House, but no final action taken. Adjourned till Second-day.

European News.

The steamer Europa, with European news to April 24th, arrived at New York May 6th.

In England, the statement that two ships were seen embedded in a floe of ice off Newfoundland, last year, still attracts attention, on the supposition that they might have been Sir John Franklin's ships. The statements published remove any doubt as to such vessels having been seen, but do not furnish any indication that they were the vessels of the missing Expedition.

Considerable interest is awakened among shippers and agriculturists as to the merits of a controversy at present going on respecting the right of the Peruvian Government to certain recently-discovered guano islands. T. Wentworth Butler, of Exeter, has written to the Times, claiming that the Islands of Lobos, in the rainless district of the South Pacific, and on which immense deposits of guano are found, do not belong to Peru, inasmuch as they were not enumerated among the Peruvian possessions when she declared her independence. On the other side of the question, the Peruvian Consul declares that the above islands are included within the limits of Peru, and warns all vessels against loading there without proper authority from the Government.

The Orestes, sloop of war, at Portsmouth, from Cape of Good Hope, reports having captured (no date) a Spanish slaver with a crew of 50 dare-devils in Mozambique Channel. The Orestes fired thirty-nine shots into the slaver before bringing her to. The O. has also taken some other prizes.

Louis Napoleon announces in the Patrie, that he does not intend to proclaim himself Emperor at the fete of the 10th May. In Paris, the reason of his published declaration is very well understood to be, the assertion of Mr. Rothschild that he would negotiate no loan if the present state of things was disturbed. It is therefore tolerably clear, from the Banker's fiat, and not from M. Bonaparte's, that the Republic will still last a while.

The ship Futtay Salem left Madras on December 3d, with 234 emigrant Coolies for the Mauritius. She fell in with a gale on the 22d, and the Coolies were placed under hatches, which were battened down; before its termination all had died.

We learn from Austria, that the proceedings against the mother and sisters of Kossuth are suspended, and that they have received permission to come to America, if they choose.

In Persia the cholera has again appeared in an aggravated form. This frightful scourge commenced its ravaging tour of the world, a score of years since, in Persia.

From the Levant we hear of pirates, and the Egyptian question is still unsettled.

The silver mines discovered in 1850, in Bohemia, are reported to be so productive that the Government has ordered the other silver mines—eleven in number, which have been abandoned for half a century—to be again worked, in hopes to find them similarly rich.

News has reached Dublin that Thomas Francis Meagher, the Irish political convict, had escaped from Van Dieman's Land.

Accident on the Rome and Watertown Railroad.

A letter from the office of the Northern Journal, at Watertown, gives the following particulars of the shocking railroad accident that occurred at Pierrepont Manor, on the evening of the 6th inst.

It appears that a company of nine persons—two married men with their wives, and five young ladies—thought to amuse themselves by an evening's ride from the Manor to Sandy Creek, on a hand-car, after, as they supposed, the last regular train for the day had passed. After running about half a mile, and as they were turning a curve in the road, they were met by a locomotive and tender, which was backing up from the Creek to the Manor.

The unfortunate occupants of the hand-car had but a moment's warning, and that moment served only to paralize the ladies with fear. One of the men seized his wife and one of the young ladies, and sprang from the car. The other four were on the car when the collision took place; three of them were thrown under the locomotive and crushed to death, and the other was found mortally wounded by a blow which she received in the forehead. The awfully mangled remains of the bodies were picked up and brought back to the Manor, to those friends who had joyously parted with them but a few moments before; but the wail of woe went up where the sounds of joy had been.

As near as we can ascertain them this morning, the names of the young ladies killed were: Miss Wright, of Oswego, and Miss Williamson, Miss Allen and Miss Andrus, of Pierrepont Manor.

Finances of Connecticut.—The message of Gov. Seymour, of Connecticut, states that the financial affairs of the State are in a most prosperous condition. Its ordinary expenses for the fiscal year ending on the 31st of March were $109,847 53, which, with $26,832 paid to the school fund, and $646 76 unpaid taxes, made a total of $137,326 18. The receipts for the year, including a balance of $26,266 22 on hand, were $176,456 21, leaving a remainder of $39,103 03 beyond the expenditures. $8,000 of this has been appropriated to the payment of the indebtedness to the school fund, which is now discharged in full, and the State commenced its present fiscal year entirely free from debt, and with $31,000 in its Treasury. Under these circumstances, the Governor recommends that the State tax be reduced from one to three-fourths of one per cent. The Governor reiterates his recommendation in favor of the adoption of the system of free banking in Connecticut.

Genuine Gallantry.—During the April term of the Court of General Sessions in New York, a man named Augustus Nicholls was convicted and sentenced to the State Prison on an indictment for burglary. Impleaded with him was a Mrs. Stanley and her husband Geo. C. Stanley, the former of whom for a time strongly asserted her innocence, but finally pleaded guilty and was remanded for sentence. Her husband had not been arrested, but subsequently he, accompanied by his counsel, presented himself before Justice Osborn, and asserted that his wife, in spite of her plea of guilty, had taken no part in the commission of the felony, and that he alone was implicated in it with Nicholls. He made an affidavit to this effect, and was then committed to prison. Thus we have an instance of a man, to save his wife, voluntarily dooming himself to the walls of a prison.

Liberian Emigrants.—The bark Ralph Cross, Capt. Skales, left Baltimore on Saturday, May 1, for Liberia, with emigrants. The emigrants are ninety-five in number, twenty-five of whom are from Maryland, twenty-two from Missouri, twenty-three from New Jersey, and the remainder from Philadelphia and other localities. The vessel was to stop at Norfolk to take on board seventy emigrants from Virginia and the Carolinas; a large proportion of whom are manumitted slaves. The emigrants are well provided with agricultural implements and tools, and will no doubt prove a highly valuable class for their new home. Among the passengers are Bishop Payne of Baltimore, with five or six others, who go out as missionaries.

Feargus O'Connor.—The Evening Post says: "This eccentric gentleman, whose arrival in the Europa we have announced, has been reported in the English newspapers to be insane. We should think, from some of his earliest proceedings in this country, that the report is not far out of the way. He strolled into Stewart's store on Friday, as we are informed, and, chucking a handsome young woman among the purchasers under the chin, asked how she would like a mustache? He was ejected from the premises, and afterward returned, but did not renew any of his wild tricks. It is said he left England without the knowledge of his friends, and that they will come after him by the next steamer."

A dispatch dated Pittsburg, Saturday, May 8, 1852, says: A lad fourteen years old, named Walter, son of John H. Richardson, residing at Lawrenceville, was yesterday killed by his step-mother, under the following circumstances:—He was uncommonly disobedient, and his father advised his step-mother to pretend to shoot him, for the purpose of intimidation. A gun had been loaded the previous evening, unknown to the step-mother, and she, in following the father's suggestion, shot the boy in the thigh and abdomen, causing instant death. A Coroner's inquest was held, and the mother committed, to take her trial at the term of the United States Court.

The Niles (Mich.) Republican of the 24th ultimo says: "The steam saw-mill owned by Gilson Osgood, in Boston, in this County, was blown up by the explosion of the boiler, and six children, playing about the premises, were killed or mortally wounded. Two little girls, one seven and the other eleven years of age, daughters of Mr. Osgood, one dead, the other mortally wounded. A son of Mr. Mercer, twelve years of age, mortally wounded. A daughter of the widow Wilcox, aged ten years, mortally wounded. The scene at the place of the disaster was most heart-rending.

The Exeter (N. H.) News-Letter believes that there are more hubs for wheels manufactured in that town in a year than in any other town in New England, and these all by two manufacturers, who have turned out within the last three months over eighty thousand. These are all made of elm. The blocks are cut off at the proper length, and turned out by help of lathes.

SUMMARY.

A few days since, Joseph Johnson, a Revolutionary soldier, died at Pleasant Mills, aged 93. He entered the service in 1776, when only 16 years old, and was in the regiment under the command of Captain Dubois, at Long Island, White Plains and Amboy; and was also in Col. Hilman's regiment, under Capt. Davis, at Woodbridge, Haddonfield, Cooper's Point Ferry, Woodbury, Egg Harbor, Salem, and other places in New Jersey. Since 1821, he received a pension of $80 per annum.

An Art-Union was last year established in Boston, under favorable circumstances and with the official support of Hon. Edward Everett, who was President, and Professor Longfellow, Vice-President. But they have taken the alarm, and at a meeting of the N. E. Art Union, on the first of May, it was unanimously voted: "That in consequence of the present state of public opinion in relation to Art Unions, it is expedient to bring the affairs of the Institution to a close."

The Western papers contain accounts of great destruction of property by the storm of Friday, April 30. The town of Leavenworth, Indiana, was nearly destroyed—forty houses were blown down, some of them substantial brick buildings, with 13 inch walls—two or three persons were killed, and a number badly injured. In various other places, houses, fences and orchards of valuable fruit trees were destroyed.

A dispatch from the village of Waukegan, Ill., dated April 27, states that on the day previous a Miss Warren went into the store of D. S. Dewey, and threw in his face and eyes two ounces of oil of vitriol. One eye is entirely destroyed, and fears are entertained that the other is irreparably injured. She supposed that he had circulated reports to her injury.

Joel A. Matteson, the Democratic nominee for Governor of Illinois, was formerly from Watertown, N. Y., as were also Gov. Farwell and O. Cole, late member of Congress from this State. Gov. Wood, of Ohio, is also from Watertown. A pretty fair contribution from one Eastern village to the dignitaries of the West.

Foster's Stone-Picker is the latest contribution to the implements of Agriculture that has come under our notice. It weighs about half a tun, is drawn by a span of horses, and picks up the movable stones on a breadth of five or six feet as fast as the horses can walk, depositing them in a box by the side of the machine.

Direct communication was had on Friday evening between the New Orleans Telegraph Office and the office of the New Orleans line in Hanover-street., New York, the whole extent of near 3,000 miles of wire having been successfully worked in a single circuit. Dispatches were sent from New York to New Orleans, and answers received sixty minutes ahead of time.

One hundred and sixty sheep, which Mr. Jewett, of Addison County, Vt., has just imported from Spain, passed through Salem, Washington County, N. Y., recently, on board the freight train, in charge of a Spanish shepherd. Mr. Jewett paid $14,000 for the flock. There was one buck which cost $900, and would shear 24 lbs. of wool.

The Utica Observer says that the State Fair is to be held this year upon land recently owned by Mr. Plant, on the New Hartford Road, just beyond the Half-Way House. The grounds are beautifully located, and have been purchased by Mr. Butterfield. The grading is provided for, and a contract made for the necessary fences, &c.

Both Houses of the Maryland Legislature have adjourned, after passing a resolution, directing the Govenor to appoint Commissioners to collect facts and confer with the Governor of Pennsylvania relative to the killing of the fugitive slave at Columbia by Officer Ridgeley.

The inhabitants of Rio Grande City, Texas, were recently excited by the murder of a Mr. Patton, a respectable merchant, by some Mexicans, who were pursued and captured some ten miles out of the city, and immediately hung; also six others who were said to belong to a regularly organized band for murdering and robbing Americans.

The bark Helen and Francis, arrived at Matanzas from Providence, fell in with, March 24, lat. 33 01, lon. 71½, the wreck of the schr. Nassau, from New York for Porto Rico, and took off one man, who stated that the schr. had been run into six days before, and that the master, mate, and three men, had been lost at the time.

The State Treasurer of Pennsylvania has officially reported to the Legislature (just adjourned) a list of three hundred and fifty public defaulters, (which is the mild term for public robbers,) who have in the aggregate robbed that heavily indebted and well taxed State of over three millions of dollars! Probably not one cent on the dollar will ever be recovered.

On the 5th of May, as Mrs. Mershon, wife of the agent of Wells & Co.'s Express, was crossing the track of the Rochester and Syracuse Railroad at Waterly as the Steamboat Express train was going west, the engine struck her, and she died of the injuries very shortly after. This makes the third lady killed within a week on this road.

The Baltimore gentleman—so the newspapers have it, but we do not like to apply the word in such a connection—who claims to own the fugitive Preston, has stated that he wants $1,500 for him—$1,100 for the man himself, and $400 for what he has paid to somebody, and for expenses, to get him.

On Friday, April 30, a train of fifty-nine cars, loaded with cattle, came down on the Central Line of Railroads to Albany, leaving enough Cattle at Buffalo waiting transportation to load one hundred cars more. This trade has grown up within two years, and is increasing very rapidly.

The German traveler Moritz Wagner, renowned for his travels in Persia and Armenia, is about to visit the United States. Hence, after exploring the Rocky Mountains, he goes to Central America, and from there he will go to the Philippine and Molucca Islands.

A meeting of the People's College Association will be held in the City of Rochester, on the 20th day of May, at 10 o'clock A. M., for the purpose of establishing a concert of action among the friends of Education throughout the State.

Carl Frederick Seeloff, a native of Brandenburg, Prussia, while walking upon the track of the New York and Erie Railroad, one mile from Wellsburg, was instantly killed by the engine of the express passenger-train bound east, at 1 o'clock A. M. of the 30th of April.

The Rochester, Lockport and Niagara Falls Railroad will be in operation next month, and within two years the roads connected with it will all be completed. There will then exist an unbroken railroad communication from this City to Chicago, forming the longest continuous line in the world.

At a fire in Catharine-st., New York, last Sabbath morning, five persons were burned to death or smothered, viz: Catharine Colgan, 45 years of age; Sarah Jane Colgan, 21 years of age; Mary Elizabeth Colgan, 10 years of age; James K. Colgan, 7 years of age, and Margaret Logan, 20 years of age.

A severe gale occurred on Lake Ponchartrain, on the 25th ult., in which the steamer Beacon, bound for Montgomery, Ala., from New Orleans, with a large cargo, sprung a leak and sunk in 10 feet water. The passengers and crew were saved.

The Chinese emigration to California is already immense, and constantly increasing. In Jan. last ten ships with emigrants sailed from Hong Kong. The civil war in China is driving away great numbers of the people, not only to California, but to the South Sea.

On Thursday afternoon, April 29, the family of Joseph Cottrell, Esq. of Mystic, Ct., missed a son near three years of age, when search was made for him, and he was found in a ditch a short distance from the house, drowned.

The Jacksonville (Fla.) News has information that the Indians in Florida are on the point of emigrating. It is said that many of the Indians have signed a pledge to go, and among them some warriors who exert a great influence.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

Miscellaneous.

Visit to Japan.

A Boston paper furnishes an account of a visit to this interesting and almost unknown country, by Capt. Cooper, of the whale-ship Manhattan. Touching at St. Peters, a small island lying a few degrees south-east of Niphon, he found eleven shipwrecked Japanese, whom he determined to convey at once to Jeddo, the capital of the Japanese empire. On his way, he fell in with the wreck of a Japanese junk, from which he rescued eleven more. He first made the land considerably to the northward of Jeddo, and going on shore, dispatched one of the rescued mariners with a message to the Emperor, to give notice of his coming and errand. The account proceeds:—

He sailed again for Jeddo, and the winds proving auspicious, in due time he entered the mouth of the bay, deep within which the city is situated. As he sailed along the passage, a barge met him coming from the city, in command of a person who, from his rich dress, appeared to be an officer of rank and consequence. This personage informed him that his messenger had arrived at Court, and that the Emperor had granted him permission to come up to Jeddo with his ship. He was, however, directed to anchor under a certain headland for the night, and the next morning was towed up to his anchorage within a furlong of the city.

The ship was immediately visited by a great many people of all ranks, from the Governor of Jeddo, and the high officers attached to the person of the Emperor, arrayed in golden tunics, to the lowest menials of the government, clothed in rags. All were filled with an insatiable curiosity to see the strangers, and inspect the thousand novelties presented to their view.

Capt. Cooper was very soon informed by a native interpreter, who had been taught Dutch, and who could speak a few mords of English, but who could talk still more intelligently by signs, that neither he nor his crew would be allowed to go out of the ship, and that if they should attempt it they would be put to death. This fact was communicated by the very significant symbol of drawing a naked sword across the throat. The captain dealt kindly with all, obtained their confidence, and assured them he had no inclination to transgress their laws, but only desired to make known to the Emperor, and the great officers of Japan, the kind feelings of himself and the people of America towards them and their countrymen. The Japanese who had been taken from the desolate island and from the wreck, when parting from their preserver, manifested the warmest affection and gratitude for his kindness. They clung to him and shed many tears. This scene, the reports of the shipwrecked men of the many kindnesses they had received, and the uniformly prudent and amiable deportment of the American captain, made a favorable impression on the Governor of Jeddo, during his stay. The great dignitary treated him with most distinguished civility and kindness.

But neither the captain nor crew of the Manhattan were allowed to go over her side. Officers were kept on board continually to prevent any infraction of this regulation; and, the more securely to ensure its maintenance and to prevent all communication with the shore, the ship was surrounded and guarded by three circular barriers of boats. Each circle was about an huudred feet asunder and the inner one about one hundred feet from the ship. In the first circle the boats were tied with a hawser so compactly that their sides touched each other, and that nothing could pass between or break through them. The sterns of the boats were next to the ship, and in these were erected long lances and other steel weapons of various and curious forms, such as are never seen or heard of among European nations. Sometimes they were covered with lacquered sheaths; at others they were left to glisten in the sun, apparently for the purpose of informing the foreigners that their application would follow any attempt to pass them. Among them were mingled flags and banners of various colors and devices. In the middle of this circle, between the Manhattan and the city, was stationed a large junk, in which the officers resided who commanded the guard surrounding the ship. The boats composing the second circle were not so numerous; those of the third were more scattering still, but the numbers thus employed were almost bewildering to look upon. They amounted nearly to a thousand, and were all armed and ornamented in a similar manner. It was a scene of the most intense interest and amusement to the Americans, the most of whom had never heard of the strange customs of that secluded and almost unknown people. As magnificient and wonderful a spectacle, however, as this vast array of boats presented during the day, decorated with gaudy banners and with glittering spears of an infinite variety of forms, in the night it was exceeded by a display of lanterns in such countless numbers and of such shapes and transparencies as almost to entrance the beholders, and to remind them of the magic of the Arabian tales.

* * * Having laid at anchor four days, and replenished his stores of wood, water, &c., he signified his readiness to depart; but the winds were adverse, and it was impossible for him to get to sea. There seemed to be no disposition manifested by the Government to force him away, but there was none for him to remain a moment beyond the time when his wants had been satisfied. A head wind and tide possessed no impediment to going away from Japan, in the mind of the Governor of Jeddo. At his command the anchor was weighed, and a line of boats attached to the bow of the ship so long that they could not be numbered. They were arranged four abreast, proceeded in the greatest order, and were supposed to amount to nearly one thousand. It was an immense train, and presented a spectacle to the eye of the seamen approaching the marvelous. The boats, instead of being propeled by rowing or paddles, were all sculled by a single oar, employed however by several men. In this manner the Manhattan was towed twenty miles out to sea, and the officers in charge of the fleet would have taken her a greater distance, had no further aid been declined. The Japanese then took corteous leave of our hero, and while the long train of barges wheeled with slow and graceful motion towards the shore, the latter spread his sails for the less hospitable regions of Kamtschatka and the north-west coast.

A Singular Case.

A correspondent in Wyoming Co. (says the N. Y. Tribune) sends us an account of a case of mental malady, moral hallucination, or whatever it may be called, which lately occurred in that region, and which may suggest some useful reflections for the student of spiritual pathology.

Something over a year since, the people of a quiet district of that county were startled with a report charging the crime of theft upon the wife of one of the most esteemed citizens of the place. What rendered the charge still more exciting, was the fact that both the accuser and accused were members of the same church, and both of hitherto untainted reputation. A suit for slander was the consequence; but before the trial came on, such was the difficulty in the way of justifying, and such the drift of public opinion in favor of the accused, that, yielding to the advice of counsel, the defendant, who was also a woman, proposed terms of settlement, and procured a release from prospective damages by paying the plaintiff some forty dollars to discontinue the suit.

Meanwhile, the church took up the matter, and tried the accuser, who seemed thus wrongfully to charge her sister with so grave an offense. On this ecclesiastical trial the accuser adhered to her original declaration, but, not sustaining it, was expelled from the communion of the society. After this, the accused went before the Grand Jury of the county, and made an earnest endeavor to procure an indictment against her accuser for perjury. But this failed, and for some time the position of the parties remained unchanged—the accused justified by the church, and the accuser eclipsed by a suspicion of perjury, and in disgrace among those she had been wont to love and honor as brethren and sisters.

But suddenly, from some cause not fully explained, the accused party, after having triumphed over the accusation and its author, has confessed the truth of the charge. She admits too, that it is true not only in the single case alledged, but that for years she has been in the habit of pilfering. A person of good education and respectable connections, she was in the possession of ample means to satisfy every desire, and stole merely to gratify an irresistible passion. What she took she used to destroy immediately afterward. Though haunted by the keenest sense of sin in the act, and wont before going where she might be tempted to commit it, to retire to her closet, and on her knees and with tears of agony streaming down her cheeks, to implore the help of Heaven to subdue the propensity, she still perpetrated the offense on every occasion.

On this confession, the husband of the unfortunate woman hastened to make restitution to all sufferers. Our correspondent adds, that in this sore affliction he is sustained by the sympathy of all who know the parties.

Letter from Dr. King in Prison.

From the New York Evangelist.

In the Prison of Athens, called Medrese,
March 9, 1852.

I am now in prison, and my name is inscribed among the vilest malefactors of Greece, in a book kept for the purpose, in which the names of all who enter are written, with their age, description of their person, and the crime of which they have been guilty. Mine is that of preaching the word of God. That of two others here in chains is the murder of seventeen persons.

The prison is called Medrese, which is a Turkish word meaning school; and this is so called because it was formerly used by the Turks as a school. And it is indeed such a school as that in which prophets and apostles were formerly taught. Do not think that I am sorrowful. By no means—my soul is full of joy—unusual joy. Before leaving my house I read the 11th, 12th, and 13th chapters of the Epistle to the Hebrews, and poured out my soul before God, not in supplications for deliverance, but in thanksgiving for his mercies, and that he had given me the privilege thus to suffer shame, and contempt, and imprisonment for the name of the Lord Jesus, and the truths which he has taught, I consider this is one of the brightest and happiest days of my life. In all the agitating scenes which have taken place within a few days past, I have felt that God was with me in a peculiar manner. My heart was tranquil, trusting in God. I felt that if my life should fall a sacrifice to the rage of my enemies, I had hope of a better house, even "a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

Last Friday, just before I went to my trial, I read the 121st Psalm in the presence of my family, offered a short prayer, and took what I thought might be a final leave of my wife, Mary, and my sweet little infant babe, and went without trembling, feeling great confidence in Him who has so often delivered me in times of danger. William I took with me, for I wished him to see the court before which his father was arraigned, and that (in case my life should be taken) he might have a more vivid impression of me in his memory. After hearing my condemnation to imprisonment and exile, I returned to my house, where I was permitted to remain a short time before going to prison. The next day I felt now and then a pang at the thought of leaving my family, and I cannot say that no tear came into my eyes when I thought the exile from the field of my labors might be perpetual. The second day, which was Sunday, found comfort in looking to Him who was with John in his exile at Patmos, "for the word of God and for the testimony of Jesus Christ." The third day, that is on Monday, I sent word to the King's Attorney that I was ready to go to prison, and the arrangement was made for me to enter this morning. But of this prison, and the state of the prisoners, I must give a short description.

Besides myself, there are one hundred and twenty-five persons. A few day since there were one hundred and eighty. These occupy eleven small rooms, eight of which are about ten or eleven feet square, in each of which are from eight to twelve persons. The other three rooms are perhaps two or three times as large, and in each are confined twenty-five persons. From these facts you can judge of the accommodations enjoyed here. Most of them have no beds on which to sleep, and some not very warmly clad. It is enough to make one's heart ache to see them. The sight of them made me feel that my trials and troubles were small. Decent looking men, and the vilest malefactors; men not yet tried, and who are perhaps innocent, and those who have already been condemned for piracy, rape, and murder; the youth who has committed perhaps his first crime, or no crime at all; and those who have grown old in iniquity, and whose consciences are seared as with a hot iron, are here crowded together in one common mass, from which proceeds an odor by no means agreeable, even now, when the weather is cool, and which, as the weather grows warm, must become intolerable. And just think of sleeping in a little room about ten feet square, with ten or eleven others locked in with you for the night, and only a small window in the door for air, and by the side of it for light, darkened by its thick, heavy, iron gates, and looking upon a small court within.

After I made my appeal to the Areopagus, the King's Attorney, at the request of my lawyers, ordered the keeper of the prison to conduct me to the Police Office, where I am to remain imprisoned till the Court above mentioned shall decide my case.

The Director of the Police treats me very kindly, and all my friends are free to call on me whenever they please, without a permit from the King's Attorney.

Yours truly, Jonas King.

Incident in Jackson's Life.

We are indebted to a friend for the following Revolutionary incident, which we believe has never appeared in print. It is well known here that Admiral Coffin, and other members of his family, continued to keep up, through life, an intimacy with their Boston friends. At a dinner with one of these friends, about the time of Jackson's administration, this incident was related by Gen. John Coffin, who is said by Sabine to have been a captain in the Orange Rangers, and to have been engaged in the battle of Eutaw Springs, Hobbirk's Hill, and other conflicts in Carolina. His statement was that in a skirmish with some American militia, in Carolina, the militia were defeated and pursued; the Captain, with some of his men, were just overtaking a young man of about sixteen, and one of his men, a little in advance, had raised his sword to cut him down, when Captain Coffin spurred his horse between them, took the boy prisoner, and took care of him. That boy was Andrew Jackson.

The True Gentleman.

He is a true gentleman who adds most manhood to his gentility; he depends, not upon his riches, not upon the firmness of his cloth, but upon his intellect, his honesty, and his truth. You may always recognize him. Though he may wear different aspects—as the painter, the poet, the sailor, the pill vender, the lawyer—the man rises superior to all circumstances. You never think of the riches of the true man, but of the man himself. You never eat his dinners and think but of the viands you have tasted, for the man eclipses his gas-light. In his house, where McDonald sits, is the head of the table, not where the roast beef and decanter is placed. He is always true to others and to himself; earnest in all his manly purposes. Is he rich, he has no more or less dignity than were he poor. Kossuth—the poor editor in Buda Pesth, the hated government, the loved of the poor—was none the less a gentleman than when he held us all enraptured with his eloquence, with this fine land for his forum, and the stars of America for his sounding-board.

The true gentleman treats all men as if they were his equals; his manners are for the poor as well as for the rich, and those manners well proportioned for all men. One day the elder Adams was driving a Southern gentleman through Quincy, in a gig. On the road he met a negro, who raised his hat and bowed to the gentlemen. The President returned the salute, much to the horror of his companion, who remarked that he never expected to see such an act. "Why not?" answered the President; "the man bowed and spoke first; would you have me exhibit less manners than a negro?" Thus it is always with the true gentleman; and the true lady is but a sweeter copy of the same thing; a diamond from the same mine, but a purer, brighter gem, worthy of being borne upon the breast of the true man. [Theo. Parker.

Mormonism in Europe.

Elder Erastus Snow, writing from Copenhagen, 23d March, says that the "work of the Lord" is progressing rapidly in spite of the determined resistence of the priesthood and nearly all the influences of the country. In Copenhagen the "Saints" occupy one of the finest halls in the city, and the whole town is divided into districts and parishes, under a regular ecclesiastical establishment. They have met with much persecution in various parts of the country. The number of "Saints" in Denmark, in good standing, is put down at 600, besides a few in Norway and Iceland. Over 700 have been baptized, and 45 have emigrated to Utah. The Elder, with a small party, is now on the way to the promised land. Twenty-eight Danish Saints were to sail from Liverpool for New Orleans on the 8th inst.

In France the book of Mormon has been stereotyped and published, and arrangements are concluded for its publication in German at Hamburg. It is already printed in Danish. In Italy the progress of the cause delights the Mormon Saints, who found their first converts among the Waldenses. The Southern European Missionaries, at whose head is Elder Lorenzo Snow, hope to penetrate Turkey and the Russian Empire via Malta.

Death of a Naturalist.

Paris Correspondence of the N. Y. Tribune.

You have heard of the death, at Prague, of Dr. Ellenberger, a naturalist of that city. This gentleman was a sort of modern Mithridates, and had for many years previous to his death been in the constant habit of swallowing the most deadly poisons, and of neutralizing their effects by immediately taking the antidotes. The Gazette Medicale of this city relates an anecdote of the practices of this person, not altogether without interest. Some years ago, M. Orfila, who was traveling in Germany, paid a visit to the Museum of Natural History at Prague; Dr. Ellenberger was presented to him, and commenced immediately to give the eminent chemist a running account of his experiments with the antidotes of the vegetable alkalis, and especially with that of strychnine and morphine, and offered to make M. Orfila an eye-witness of his success. He sent to a neighboring apothecary's for fifteen decigrammes (23 grains Troy!) of acetate of morphine, and M. Orfila having declared it to be perfectly pure, he rolled it into a bullet and swallowed it. Thirty seconds after, he took an equal quantity of a white powder, which he carried in his pocket. No effect whatever followed this double dose. The Doctor stated that he had already done the same thing times without number, upon himself, upon animals, and even upon plants, which he washed first with a liquid strongly impregnated with a poison, and afterward with the antidote. He had even made experiments with strychnine, and always with success. His death was caused by the accidental use of the wrong counter-poison, after having swallowed a heavy dose of some violently active agent.

Dr. Johnson at the Tea-Table.

"At the tea-table," says Mr. Cumberland, "Johnson had considerable demands upon his favorite beverage, and I remember when Sir Joshua Reynolds, at my house, reminded him that he had drank eleven cups, he replied, 'Sir, I did not count your glasses of wine; why should you number my cups of tea?' and then laughing, in perfect good humor, he added, 'Sir, I should have released the lady from any further trouble, if it had not been for your remarks; but you have reminded me that I want one of a dozen, and I must request Mrs. Cumberland to round up my number.' When he saw the readiness and complacency with which my wife obeyed his call, he turned a kind and cheerful look upon her, and said, 'Madam, I must tell you, for your comfort, you have escaped much better than a certain lady did a while ago, upon whose patience I intruded greatly more than I have on yours; but the lady asked me for no other purpose than to make a zany of me, and set me gabbling to a parcel of people I knew nothing of; so, madam, I had my revenge of her, for I swallowed five-and-twenty cups of tea, and did not treat her with as many words.'"

Burning of a Hindoo Wife.

From the Calcutta Englishman.

The first night of the of this year witnessed one of those fearful tragedies, to the suppression of which the philanthropists, both in England and India, proudly point as one of Lord William Bentick's crowning acts in the cause of humanity. The following is pretty near the truth: The Rajah died at Pachete on the 1st of January, at about 4 P. M.; a wild cry was raised by the women of the zenana, that the Rajah was dead; this was soon silenced, and a guard placed at some distance round the rajbarry. On the death of the Rajah being made known to the heir, he proceeded to the apartments of his mother, received the ticca, and was told to enjoy his dignity, for that her mind was made up. The present Rajah left his mother and saw her no more. A pile was hurriedly made within the precincts of the rajbarry. At about 10 o'clock, volumes of smoke told that the horrid custom of that house was being carried out. The Ranee walked seven times round the pyre; and then threw herself from some blocks of wood into the flames which had been lighted for that purpose. After a few convulsive struggles to escape, her ashes mingled with those of her idiot husband, who detested her in life.

The farce of sending a long procession to Cutwa, said to contain the body of the Rajah and his sick wife, was then carried out. They managed to reach Cutwa at a convenient hour of the night, burnt some wood, made some presents, and gave information to the police. The sick Ranee was to have proceeded to Juggernaut, and there die; but the Suttee having got wind, the latter part could not be carried out, and it became necessary to personate the Ranee, which is now being done in the person of Suirat Rebee, to the no small profit of the subordinate official.

Central African Exploration.

The London Athenæum contains an account of the movements of the two enterprising travelers, Drs. Barth and Overweg. According to the last communications home, they were on the point of starting on a highly interesting journey to Borgu, a mountainous country, lying to the north-east of Lake Tsad, about midway on the road to Egypt, and never yet visited by any European. Important results are anticipated from this exploration. On their return, the travelers will direct all their energies to the south, namely, from Kuka to the shores of the Indian Ocean. Dr. Barth believes that a more southerly route, in the direction of Lake Nyassi, will be much more practicable than a straight line to Mombas, on a bearing of about south-east. The information collected respecting the Nyassi line, indicates many powerful kingdoms, densely peopled, intersected by numerous rivers, very fertile, and abounding in forests. Dr. Barth and his companion have rendered good services, so far, in determining accurately what before was but vaguely known. The routes already performed amount, at a rough estimate, to 3,700 geographical miles; and the itineraries sent home by Dr. Barth form a network which covers the greatest portion of Northern Africa. It seems, however, that they are but poorly provided with means for the prosecution of their researches, the whole of the sum originally granted by the English Government having been received, and their own means well nigh exhausted; while now they have only to look forward to £200, which is to be placed at their disposal on reaching the Indian Ocean.

Presence of Mind.

The herdsman of a farm in Scotland had occasion, lately, to send his daughter for the cattle under his charge. There were about eighty of them, and among them two bulls, one of which was occasionally in the habit of assaulting people. On the day in question, the damsel unwarily approached the bull too closely, when he immediately gave chase. On a level field, without dykes, bogs, or any other place of refuge to resort to, what would the reader have done—for, to run home, a distance of three-quarters of a mile, was out of the question. The girl, with great presence of mind, ran over to the other bull—a good-natured animal, and much stronger than her assailant. Standing close by his side, and tapping him kindly on the back, she drove him toward her father's house, followed by her enraged enemy, who kept roaring and fuming all the way; but when he came too close, her protector turned round, and with a shake and toss of his head, kept the assailant at bay. In this manner the fugitive arrived safely at home.

Statistics of Poetry.—A writer in the National Intelligencer entertains the readers of that journal with treating poetry as other branches of productive industry are treated statistically. Milton, he says, often produced five hundred lines a year. He began to write at about seventeen, and lived to sixty-seven, thus composing during fifty years. His "Paradise Lost" is about ten thousand lines; "Paradise Regained" about two thousand; "Samson Agonistes" one thousand and seven hundred; "Comus" one thousand three hundred, &c., &c., making in all about twenty-one thousand lines. Dryden's regular poems, including his translations, make about sixty thousand lines. He began almost in his childhood, and lived to be seventy-one, writing incessantly by contract; averaging about two thousand lines a-year. Pope began at twelve, and died at fifty-seven; producing, in forty-five years about forty thousand lines, some eight thousand of which at most are original. His original poetry was at less than the rate of two hundred lines a-year. Gray, the next of our great bards, lived fifty-five years. He began to write about twenty, and left one thousand verses. Byron, beginning at twelve and ending at thirty-seven, produced about ten thousand more verses than Homer. He tripled the productions of Virgil and Tasso; he greatly exceeded the volume of Dante and Ariosto; and he doubled Milton, writing about twenty-five years less.

"Liquor in Transitu."—One day last week (says the Potland Advocate) several casks of liquor came from Boston in one of the steamers, marked "Gorham, N. H." On their arrival at the wharf, and when they were about to be transferred to the cars for the place of destination, they were claimed by some individuals in this city. The agents who had them in charge refused to deliver them here, as they felt bound to put "them through" according to the directions, and placed them upon the freight train with this object in view. The real owners thus being foiled in their attempt to get possession of their liquor here, selected an agent to follow it to "Gorham, N. H.," where it was secured and brought back to the city on return. It was no sooner landed here, however, than our new, vigilant police seized the same and had it carted to the government house, where more of the same sort had been deposited in days past. By this operation the railroad realized the sum of $500 as freight money, together with the fare of the agent who followed it, and the city authorities, the worth of the liquor, whatever it may be—a handsome business transaction all round!

Writing for a Newspaper.—"It is not so easy a task to write for a newspaper as people suppose. A man may be a good scholar, a profound thinker, a vigilant observer of passing events, without being able to write for a newspaper. The power of writing a leading article for a newspaper is a tact which few possess, and which we have known many, with all their learning and diligence, unable to acquire. It requires a large amount of information on a variety of subjects, and a readiness of application that must never be at fault, or the writer will fail. For, remember, the editor is always writing against time, and the inexorable printer must have his copy, so that there is no time to revise and amend; but as slip after slip is written, the "devil" snatches it away, and one-half is usually set up in print before the other half is written. This exacts a decision of thought and a facilily of writing, which, like poetry, seems rather a gift of nature than an acquired faculty."

Successful Californians.—A person writing from San Francisco to the Newport News, gives the following incident: "Two common-looking persons entered the hotel this morning, just from the mines—a man and his wife. The male individual looked, for all the world, like a day-laborer, and the female bore a close resemblance to an Irish scullion. She wore coarse, vulgar brogans, and to her girdle was attached a gold watch and chain valued at least at two hundred dollars. The husband left the hotel for half an hour, and returned with a receipt for one hundred and fifteen thousand dollars, the value of the dust which he had just consigned for transportation to New York. This sum has been gained by digging; the husband dug while the wife washed, assisted by her little son, aged about ten years."

One of the Women.—The Rhode Island Temperance Advocate tells the following good story of a woman who is worth her weight in gold:—

"In Foster, there was an intemperate man who had promised his wife that he would vote for the Maine Law candidates for the Senate and House. On the morning of election day, he was enticed to the tavern, and treated by his anti-law associates till he was drunk. His wife heard of it, searched him out, and got him home. Here she gave him an emetic, and got him sober, and then borrowed a horse and wagon and drove him to the polls. He voted for the Maine Law candidates, and his single vote prevented the election of a rum Representative. The result of it is, that we get one, and possibly two Maine Law men from that town."

The Galena (Ill.) Jeffersonian says that the last survivor of the party that accompanie Lewis and Clarke in the famous overland expedition to the Pacific in 1814-'15-'16, has been remaining at the American House in that city, for a few days past. In company with his sons, he is now on his way to California, over nearly the same route, for half the distance, that he traveled forty years ago.

TIDINGS FROM JERUSALEM.

Report of the Agricultural Manual Labor School of Palestine, in Bethlehem of Judea. [Concluded.

While we waited for word from Bethlehem, we visited some of the extensive and rich farm-like gardens near Jaffa. The light rich soil was planted with dense groves of orange, lemon, and citron trees, heavily laden with their golden fruit, now in its season. We counted nine and ten oranges on one twig; also pomegranates, almonds, apricots, peaches, figs, bananas, mulberry, vines, and the lofty and beautiful palm tree, luxuriate in exceeding beauty in the entire back-ground of the city. They also raise grain, and a few vegetables, but are greatly deficient in the most needful and staple kinds. When we asked the Consul's agent the reason of this, he said that "until within a few years the rain had been so light and irregular, that it was impossible to raise many vegetables, but recently there had been much more rain, and even some showers in September, and many persons were beginning to succeed in raising them; but they had but few seeds, and were ignorant of the manner of culture."

After four days our dear young friend, Petro Meshullam, with his faithful Arab, Ah-mud, arrived to escort us to Artoss. It was a meeting of much joy, Ah-mud making great signs of delight, and Petro informing us of his parents' health and prosperity, of their anxiety on our account, and happiness at hearing of our safe arrival. They had lodged with the Arabs two nights on their way, it being impossible sooner to cross the plains, on account of the flooded state of the streams. They immediately set about hiring camels, mules, and horses, but the rain commencing anew, the camels could not travel, and we were detained ten days.

We had now a serious and difficult undertaking, as some of our boxes must be divided, being too large and heavy for the camels. (Boxes should never exceed 3 feet square, or more than 300 lbs. in weight.) Every article was weighed by an official overseeing, (Petro interpreting;) twenty cameleers balooing, and talking together, and the camels groaning when too heavy an article was laid on. The price of freight to Bethlehem was 35 paistres a cantar (600 lbs.) Some of the larger camels carried a cantar, half on each side; others less; and the mules about 300 weight. Our caravan was a day and a half in packing and setting out. We had 16 camels, 8 mules, and 7 horses.

On the 15th of March we left the gates of the city, and passed through fields of wheat and barley, olive orchards, &c., over the extensive plains, covered with the richest green and flowers, every where greeted kindly by the natives, and arrived at sunset at Ramla, and found shelter at the Latin Convent.

At sunrise next morning we were again on our way over the lovely plains; and were much strengthened in our severe ride up the steep crags, while a slight veil of clouds sheltered us from the hot sun. All were delighted with the beauty and fertility of the plains, and with the sublimity of the mountains, as their innumerable terraces were covered with shrubs and flowers. The sun set as we reached Bethlehem, and at dusk we entered the abode, and found our long-tried and beloved brother and sister Meshullam waiting to receive us. Tears flowed as we received their kind and tender welcome. We had been so long on our passage that they had been much oppressed with anxiety on our account, as we had written to them on leaving the United States. He had nired two large rooms in the village for us, until we shall be able to build additional rooms in the valley.

Dear sister M. had every thing in readiness for a good supper, to which our long, fatiguing journey gave a relish. The Christian love with which we were received, and the joy of beholding once more their faces, and those of their lovely children, filled my long-oppressed, anxious heart, with peace.

March 20.—Several days have passed since our arrival, and our friends present are all greatly pleased with the situation and appearance of the country, the soil, and the prospect of things here, and feel more and more attached to our excellent friend. They all, with one consent, say that the reality and sight far exceed their happiest expectations; and our hearts are humbled in loving gratitude to God, who has counted us worthy to enter his land, and given so great a deliverance.

I easily discern a great change in M.'s affairs and position, with respect to his independent establishment in Bethlehem, his power and influence with the Turkish Government, and the English residents in Jerusalem, the Shieks or petty rulers of the Arabs, and with the inhabitants of all Bethlehem and the surrounding country. If I had space I could show this by many facts, but a few must suffice.

As the number of European visitors is greatly increasing, the benevolent labors and improvements of M. have become, of late, more extensively known and appreciated. He has recently received from both religious and agricultural organizations, a number of the most favorable offers of men and means, in their connection. "On account," he said, "of his pre-correspondence with American friends," and his constant desire to be free from all party liabilities, he has, thus far, declined them.

Through a recent petition of the Turkish Effendi (nobility) of Jerusalem, the Sultan has lately (unexpectedly to him) sent him an offer of the site of the ancient Cesarea and its fertile vicinity, if he will undertake and superintend its rebuilding and cultivation! This is greatly surprising and important, as Cesarea has the most lovely and easily rebuilt ruins in Palestine, and is a point of great commercial importance, and entrance to the whole land, and was formerly the chosen port of the Romans. This he declines, from his love to Jerusalem and his suffering brethren within its walls.

In the constant oppressions of the poor peasants by the petty functionaries of Government, he has been a friend and deliverer to many a poor son of Ishmael. Many of them visit him daily, and express the most perfect confidence and affection for him and his family, and often say, on account of their oppression, "We desire to become Christains, and serve you, for you judge righteously, and deliver the poor."

The wild Arabs and Shieks of the Jordan, that have always been the terror of the Government and all travelers, are his particular friends, and protect his cattle pasturing on the plains of Jericho. One, who has long been the Grand Shiek over the wild Bedouins and half of Palestine, is now a rebel against government, but is greatly devoted to M., though he dare not venture near Jerusalem under the protection of M. He came the next day after our arrival, to pay a visit. He manifested great pleasure at seeing M., kissing his hand, &c., &c. M., in return, treated him with marked attention. When he was introduced to us, and informed of our object to settle with and aid M. in his efforts for the good of this land, he expressed great satisfaction, and asked at what time we would visit his people. He said that if we would bring one of our ploughs to the plains of Jordan, and plough a few spaces for an example to his men, they would ever regard it as a pledge of friendship between us, and afterwards we could come and go through his territory safely at pleasure.

The other day a gentleman lost his way among the wild Arabs, and was in great danger, when he bethought himself of Meshullam's name, which he uttered with a few Arab words. They immediately changed their manners to great kindness, brought him food, and conducted him safely to Artoss.

As he was riding to Jerusalem with my dear A., on some business with the Pasha and English Consul, on our mutual behalf, the Arabs kindly greeted them along the way, and some exclaimed: "God send us more of these people," meaning such as Meshullam. On this account there is much jealousy working among different parties here.

On our arrival at Jaffa, it was instantly reported at Jerusalem, that twenty-five families, and even 200 Americans, had come to take possession, &c. A petty revolution succeeded, and soldiers were sent to imprison Mr. M.'s Arab servants in Artoss—to compel an extortion of taxes, because they had been owners of that land, and had so prospered under his employ; so that the same day that Petro set out to meet us, Mr. M. was summoned to Jerusalem to rescue his poor friends and dependents. There he remained all night, in close council with the Pasha and English Consul; the gates of Jerusalem were kept open till midnight for soldiers to go out to protect Mrs. M. and her two youngest babes, who were left there alone, the poor laborers having all fled for fear. Towards morning M. almost fainted as he was pleading in Turkish before the Pasha for his poor people, having remained in wet clothes all night, on account of the great rain through which he rode to the city. The result was, a petition to the Sultan, signed by the Pasha himself, and the English Consul, (as the tumult was beyond the power of the Pasha,) for a premium for these poor men, on account of M's improvement of their land, and also a freedom of taxes for them for seven years! (M. also pledged 4000 paistres in the hands of the Pasha to liberate his poor friends until the answer of the Sultan arrives. By the blessing and power of God, with his prompt and efficient intervention, a great victory is gained, and peace and quiet are restored.)

But I must soon close my letter, to send by this first opportunity since our arrival in Jaffa, which occurs but once a month, by the English mail. I have several dear friends, to whom I am greatly indebted, to whom I desire to write at the first moment's time, but the constant call on my heart and hands, in the present laborious event of settling in the valley, must deter me till the next mail. We have nearly five months' washing to be done, unpacking tools, seeds, and necessaries for present need, cooking, &c., intending to leave all we can spare of our luggage locked up in two rooms in the village, to stay a few weeks, with our beds, dishes, tools, and seeds only, in Meshullam's small rooms, closely but comfortably lodged, until the rainy season is over, and our tents can be put up for the summer, so as to immediately get all needful vegetables growing as soon as possible. All practical persons will perceive, that with the additional hinderance of a strange language, and new customs, we have little time or place for writing.

March 25th.—To-day we are fixed in Artoss, and, as I look out at the door, I can see Meshullam and A., and the other brethren, and between them an Israelite and an Arab, all busy in a field near by, planting potatoes, of seed brought with us, as M. had few left. We had also half a barrel of sweet potatoes, which all endured the long damp voyage, not one being decayed. This we esteem a great favor from the Lord, as they so easily decay. Dr. B., an American, brought out a whole barrel last year, of which but one potato was preserved, which afterwards was lost from misunderstanding its culture. Our fruit trees from E. P. of Maryland, arrived in good condition, are set out near M.'s house. We were anxious on the way at our long detention, fearing that we should be too late for spring planting; but we find that we are just in the right time, as it has been very cold and rainy, and the valley too moist to plant much until now, and we should have suffered much had we been here from exposure, as even now, without fire or glass windows, we find it very cool at night, and we need the warmest clothing. Through the tender mercy of the Lord, the health of all our number has been improved, and remains good.

We do hope some of the Lord's people will send us the following list of articles pressingly needed: Thirty yards of red flannel, and as much canton flannel; and two very stout overcoats for the brethren; some oil cloth coats and pants; 25 yards of heavy, wide bagging, to make bags; 7 pairs of old-fashioned gum overshoes, Nos. 6, 7, 8, (two No. 7s for women;) also, we lost our medicine box, which should be replaced, on account of the chills, and the sick poor; a box of all kinds of old-fashioned shoes, from two years old and upwards; some good stout and heavy unbleached and striped shirting, and some sattinet for coats and pants, as the weather, during the six months that rain is prevalent, is very much colder than we had supposed, and the poor around us suffer very much from want of warm clothes; some calico, fast colors, for Mrs. Meshullam and the sisters, and to make up for others, and some of bright colors for the children. And we imperatively need two or three good wool cards, and a large spinning-wheel, to make stockings. Who will help us to them?

Our hearts and our hands are full [illegible] this needed, blessed work, and we forget the trials behind us. Many Europeans, Jews, and Arabs, are coming and going from Artoss, and Mrs. M. needs all the female hands with us, in the great care of the unlimited hospitality to great and small. All that come must eat, and often sleep, before they return, as it is some eight miles from Jerusalem, and they cannot travel after night, as the gates are shut at sunset. Several Jews have been out to see us from Jerusalem, and desire to unite with us, and others are waiting to come and work with us, as soon as the weather is settled, as we have no shelter for them. If we had the means to put up a few cheap rooms, we could soon fill them with poor Jews who are willing to join us. O, that Christians at home could see their need, and hear their urgent appeals!

March 28th.—Yesterday was our first Sabbath in the valley, in peace and harmony. Oh! how precious the season of worship. We have had many other seasons of unity and love in family worship in the morning; M. with his Hebrew Bible before him; Mrs. M. her Italian copy; and one of our brethren reads the promises of God to Israel in English.

With the sincere love and most grateful remembrance of all our united little family, to all our beloved Christian friends in the West, I remain their devoted friend and servant for Jesus' sake, C. S. MINOR.

The following is a brief letter of acknowledgment to donors in the United States, from Bro. Meshullam:—

Artoss, March 29, 1852.

Dear Christian Friends,—I am happy to add a few words to this letter, to express my sincere regards to all the devoted "lovers of Israel" in America, and especially to those who have sent their aid, by our dear friends who have just arrived in Artoss. It has been a great pleasure to me and my family to receive them, and I hope the blessing of God will rest on our mutual and united labors.

I would acknowledge the receipt of the agricultural tools from Messrs. A. & B. Allen & Co., and Mr. T. B. S. of New York; also, of some others from Messrs. W. H. & G. W. Allen, and others, of Philadelphia; the excellent assortment of seeds from friends in Connecticut; the fruit-trees and other useful things from "A Friend" in Maryland, and the other different donations and articles given for our mutual assistance. But my many engagements hinder my writing more at this time. While I remain, with Christian love, your devoted friend and brother, JOHN MESHULLAM.

[Contributions of moneys, goods, &c., can be sent to the address of James L. Boyd, Agent for Meshullam & Co., No. 222 North Ninth St., Philadelphia, or to the other agents, at the following places: Matthew Smith, No. 3 Crown St., New Haven, Ct.; J. B. PRAYING.

In the very curious and entertaining little work on Tartary, Thibet, and China, by the French missionary, M. Huc, there is an account of a mode of saying prayers, well established among the Mongol Boodhists, and even among the Lamas, their priests, which must be deemed somewhat more than ordinarily remarkable. The Boodhists pray—as we, of a civilized land, spin, weave, print, and do everything else, almost, of a secular character—by machinery. They have actually in use a praying mill, as the good Father Huc honestly calls it, consisting of a sort of wheel or cylinder, with written prayers pasted all over it; which, being turned by hand, or in any other convenient way, and bringing at each upward rotation a great number of supplications under the eye of the god Buddha, (which we suppose is the principle of the thing,) is believed to offer a perfectly sufficient substitute for the somewhat more laborious practice of praying by word of mouth. Nor is this all. The reverend traveler adds that nothing is more common than to see such prayer-mills (Chukors, literally "turning prayers") "fixed in the beds of running streams"—power prayer-mills, therefore—in which, kept in continual motion by the water, they "go on praying night and day for the special benefit of the persons who place them there."

Pride and Humility.—I have never yet found pride in a noble nature, nor humility in an unworthy mind. Of all trees, I observe that God hath chosen the vine—a low plant, that creeps upon a helpless wall; of all beasts, the soft and patient lamb; of all fowls, the mild and guileless dove. When God appeared to Moses, it was not in a lofty cedar, nor the sturdy oak, nor the spreading elm, but a bush—an humble, slender, abject bush; as if he would, by these selections, check the arrogance of man. Nothing procureth love, like humility; nothing hate, like pride. [Feltham.

LINES.

BY WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT.

The May sun sheds an amber light
  On new-leaved woods and lawns between;
But she who, with a smile more bright,
  Welcomed and watched the springing green,
        Is in her grave,
        Low in her grave.

The fair white blossoms of the wood
  In groups beside the pathway stand;
But one, the gentle and the good,
  Who cropped them with a fairer hand,
        Is in her grave,
        Low in her grave.

Upon the woodland's morning airs
  The small birds' mingled notes are flung;
But she whose voice, more sweet than theirs,
  Once bade me listen while they sung,
        Is in her grave,
        Low in her grave.

That music of the early year
  Brings tears of anguish to my eyes;
My heart aches when the flowers appear,
  For then I think of her who lies
        Within her grave,
        Low in her grave.

THE ANNIVERSARIES.

The American Seamen's Friend Society.

The 24th Anniversary of this Society was held in the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, on the evening of Second-day, May 10. Besides the usual introductory exercises, and speeches by several individuals, the audience were furnished with the following abstract of the Annual Report:—

The Report commences by noticing the difficulty of giving annually a history of the progress of moral changes. As a minute is too short to mark the changes in the progress of light, from star-light till noon, so a year is too brief to mark the progress of the kingdom of moral light. It contrasts the present with thirty years ago, and notes the progress of our commerce, in the tunnage, speed, and beauty of our ships, and in the increased number and improved character of our seamen. Then our tunnage was a little over 1,000,000, our seamen less than 50,000; now it is nearly 4,000,000, and our seamen more than 200,000. It notices also the increased interest and efforts for the temporal, moral, and religious improvement of seamen, and the success of these efforts.

The receipts of the Society for the year, ending May 1, from all sources, including a balance of $243 64 from last year's account, were $23,660 64. Expeditures for the year, $22,641 01. An increase in receipts over the last year of $2,970 43. This does not include the amounts raised and expended by branches, auxiliaries, and other Seamen's Friend Societies on our seaboard, and on our Western lakes, rivers, and canals.

The Society continues its missions in successful operation in China, Chili, the West Indies, France, and Sweden. It has also sent, during the year, chaplains to San Francisco, to Panama, to Rio de Janeiro, to Denmark, and has one under commission for St. Helena, and extends aid to three chaplaincies in our own ports.

There has been more or less religious interest among seamen at nearly all the foreign stations, and some revivals on shipboard, as well as in our own ports. Bibles and evangelical books, in various languages, have been extensively circulated among seamen of almost all nations. The Sailors' Home in New York, under the patronage of the Society, is prosperous. It has received during the year, 3,027 sailor-boarders; 211 of whom have become officers of ships; 993 have signed the temperance pledge; 370 of them apparently reformed inebriates; 218 shipwrcked and destitute men and boys have been relieved at an expense of $683 08, besides a considerable amount of clothing furnished by various Ladies' Societies. The whole number which have entered the Home in ten years, since it was first opened, is 33,527. Boarders at the Home have deposited within the year over $11,000 in the Seamen's Savings Bank, in Wall-st. This Bank has now over $5,000,000, a considerable portion of which has been deposited by seamen. The fact tells the story of their improvement, and of the productiveness of the investment for their reformation. The "pound" given to them, or for them, has gained more than "ten pounds."

The whole number of seamen who have boarded in Temperance Houses in New York, within the year, is about 7,000, and the number in the Homes and Temperance Houses, in all our sea ports, not far from 26,000, while the number that enter these ports annually is over 250,000.

American and Foreign Christian Union.

The 3d Anniversary of the American and Foreign Christian Union was held at the Broadway Tabernacle on Third-day morning.

The Report of the Treasurer states that during the last year the sum of $55,652 99 was received, which, added to the balance on hand, $996 92, made $56,649 91, all of which, with the exception of the balance now on hand of $2,005 73, was expended. In addition to the above receipts and expenditures, the Treasurer has the pleasure to announce, that of the $10,000 which appeared in the last Annual Report, as advanced by the members of the Board in anticipation of assets—$6,308 64 have been paid, and the balance provided for out of the Legacy Fund in the hands of the Treasurer. Also, that the sum of $11,500, which was collected by Rev. L. Pilatte, has been remitted by the Treasurer to the Evangelical Society of France, (at Paris,) which Society is now united with the American and Foreign Christian Union in its work in France. This sum might properly appear in the body of the Report. Also, that credits have been forwarded to the missionaries at Rome, Geneva, Paris, and other parts of France, Sweden, Ireland, and Canada, to the amount of $4,311, which amount does not appear in the Report, but for the payment of which provision has been made.

The following abstract of the Report of the Board was then read by Rev. Dr. Baird, and adopted:—

The Board are much encouraged by the year's work. The receipts are $56,249—$5,000 more than the previous year; they have found a large number of suitable laborers; the labors of their Missionaries have been very successful, both at home and abroad. They refer to the need of more effort among our foreign population, the Catholic Church being especially active in that field. There are 85 laborers in this field, distributed in 15 States; some of them have settled congregations; others travel over very wide districts. Four Missions have been temporarily suspended; 15 new ones established; one church of 95 converted Romanists has connected itself with the Baptists; a few other congregations are preparing for a similar movement. More than 1,000 sermons have been preached; 5,000,000 pages distributed; 20,000 Romanist families visited, furnished with tracts, &c., and a large number have been converted. In the Foreign field, $1,000 has been given to assist the French Canadian Missionary Society; the Board have two Missionaries in Hayti, one at Valparaiso, one at Rio Janeiro, one in Ireland, eleven in France, two in Sweden, two in Italy; in all, 25.

American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society.

The Anniversary of this Society was held on the afternoon of Third-day, May 11, in the Broadway Tabernacle, N. Y., Arthur Tappan, Esq., in the chair. The audience was large and respectable, and although there were a few present who, it was evident from their conduct, dissented from the sentiments of the speakers and the spirit of the meeting, the greatest enthusiasm was manifested in the proceedings by the majority of the audience. Addresses were delivered by Hon. E. D. Culver, Rev. J. P. Raymond, and Rev. H. W. Beecher, in support of a series of resolutions which were adopted. We copy from one of the daily papers the following abstract of the Annual Report and Resolutions:—

The Report narrates the labor of the year, books published, papers circulated, &c. It refers to the visit and address to Kossuth, and regrets that he was not more emphatic in asserting his adherence to the principles for which he struggled in Hungary. Allusion is made to the Fugitive Law, and its operation in the case of Preston and others, &c. The Report also notices the defeat of the Government in the Christiana treason trials; the indignant feeling of the people in regard to Slavery, which appears in conventions, resolutions, addresses, &c.; the alarm of the slave States in regard to the increasing number of free colored persons; the aid extended to fugitives in Canada; the efforts of the Colonization Society; the duty of aiding free colored persons to attain a proper social position, &c. It refers to Mr. Webster's statement, that nature had forbidden the introduction of Slavery into New Mexico and California; to the attempt to divide California so as to make another slave State; the insulting language of the Governor of New Mexico to free people of color, and his recommendation of a law to keep them out of the Territory. The law of Oregon forbidding negroes to reside in the Territory is contrasted with the Mormon repudiation of Slavery. The report states that kidnapping is more common in the Free States than people are aware of, the Fugitive Slave Act affording facilities for it. The imprisonment of colored seamen is commeted upon, and also the evils and dangers impending over the South by reason of Slavery. Inquiry is then made what, under such circumstances, is the North doing for the removal of such a calamitous state of things? Both Whigs and Democrats seem disposed to accede to the "finality of the Compromise" to attain their ends, and religious men are too much disposed to be indifferent or opposed to Anti-Slavery action. The American Tract Society and the American Sunday School Union refuse to publish any work on the sinfulness of Slavery, and expurgate foreign publications reprinted by them. The American Home Missionary Society supports upward of sixty missionaries in connection with churches that receive slaveholders in their communion. The American B. C. F. M. allow their missionaries among the Indians to organize churches composed in part of slaveholders and slaves. The General Assembly (O. S.) refuse to legislate on the subject of Slavery, on the plea that, as a spiritual body, it has no cognizance of civil matters. The General Assembly (N. S.) while it has borne testimony against the evils of Slavery, and allows that they should be corrected by discipline, admits slaveholders to a seat in its councils, and treats them "rectus in ecclesia." But there is cause of joy that in Congress and State Legislatures there are many good and true men still battling for the right. Friendly reference is made to the labors of the British and Foreign Society, &c. &c.

The resolutions aver: The sinfulness of Slavery; that it is a reproach to our boasted free Republic; that the spirit of Caste is nearly allied to Slavery in turpitude; that the Fugitive Slave Law is an outrage, and should be disobeyed and execrated; that they discountenance coercive expatriation (colonization;) that they sympathize with the colored, bond or free; that they honor the true men who legislate for right and justice; that they call upon woman to use all her influence in favor of the cause; that they rebuke the editorial expurgation of books and papers in obedience to Slavery's demand; that they return thanks to the friends of the oppressed in Canada; that they urge union and effort, and hope for victory.

American Sunday School Union.

The 28th Annual Meeting of the Sunday School Union was held in the Musical Fund Hall, Philadelphia, on Third-day, May 11.

Receipts, $193,846 22; of which $45,826 54 were donations, and $4,201 95 legacies; $136,703 95 for sales and in payment of debts; from tenants renting rooms of the Society $2,375; rent of depository $3,000; loan received $200; balances from last year $1,528 78.

Expenditures, for stereotype plates, $3,233 16; copy-right and editing, $2,781 69; engravings, $3,280 95; paper, $40,733 03; printing, $14,552 17; binding, $50,046 16; Bibles and Testaments bought, and miscellanous books purchased to fill orders, $6,385 17; interest on loans, $2,449 56; salaries of Secretary, Superintendent of book-store, Book-keeper, Salesman, Clerks, and Laborers, $8,582 19; rents of depository and offices, $3,000; taxes, $624 80; salaries and expenses of one hundred and fifty-two Missionaries and Agents, and donations of books to poor schools, &c., $52,907 33, (which includes an over-draft this year of $1,468 05 more than the amount received for this purpose;) miscellaneous items, $5,219 84; balance, cash on hand, $50 17.

The Society is now indebted for paper, binding, &c., $23,999 62, which, added to the amount of loans bearing interest, $39,360 29, exhibits a total indebtedness of $63,359 91. The amount of stock of paper and books is $90,694 45.

One hundred and forty Sunday School Missionaries have been employed, for various periods of time, in twenty-six different States and Territories. These Sunday School Missionaries have established 1,685 new schools, and have visited and revived 1,785 other schools, altogether embracing 24,999 teachers, and 174,323 scholars. They have distributed, by sale and donation, $37,224 worth of religious books for children and youth. The Board have just appointed a Missionary to establish Sunday Schools in California, and other places on the Pacific coast.

Donations of Books, Tracts, &c., have been made (including $1,725 80, the details of which are not yet reported,) to the value of $17,419 22, and these, with the charges to the donation account specified in the general report of receipts and expenditures, makes the amount expended in missionary labor and donations during the year ending March 1, 1852, $52,907 33.

Thirty-eight new publications have been issued during the last year, equal to 5,750 pages 18mo. The Sunday School Journal, published semi-monthly, for teachers, and the Youth's Penny Gazette, published every other week, for children, with over 100,000 subscribers, continue to receive increased patronage, and the great reduction of postage on these papers, under the new Post-Office law, will, no doubt, largely increase the circulation. No profit is derived from these papers, the subscription price merely covering the outlay for paper and printing.

The total value of publications distributed during the year is $149,343 50.

American Tract Society.

The American Tract Society held its 27th Annual Meeting at the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, on Fourth-day, May 12. The usual Reports were presented, from which the following facts are taken:—

New publications, 96, of which 25 are volumes, in English, German, French, Spanish, Portugese, Italian, Dutch, and Danish. Total publications, 1,685, of which 352 are volumes, total approved abroad, in about 114 languages, 2,763.

The monthly edition of the American Messenger is 200,000; of the American Messenger in German, 25,000; and of "The Child's Paper," about 125,000. Of the Family Christian Almanac were printed 310,000; of the Christian Almanac in German 30,000.

Circulations of Publications, 8,892,973, including 967,269 volumes, and embracing 283,296,568 pages. Total since the formation of the Society, 128,719,840 publications, including 7,535,064 volumes. Gratuitous circulation during the year, among the destitute, 65,164,181 pages, value about $43,500, including 6,610,335 pages to Life Members.

Receipts, in donations, $116,406 41; for sales, $226,343 50; total, with balance of $109 02 in the Treasury, $342,858 93. Expenditures, including $79,073 82 for colportage, and $20,000 remitted to foreign and pagan lands, $342,199 10. Balance in the Treasury, $659 83; leaving the Society under obligations for paper, to be paid within six months, $45,487 05.

General Agents and Superintendents of Colportage, to the number of twenty-one, have been employed for large districts of country, in raising funds, and securing and superintending the labors of colporteurs.

The whole number of colporteurs, during the whole or part of the year, has been 643, including 170 students from 40 different institutions for their vacations; exclusive of 73 recently commissioned. Of the whole, 104 were devoted to the foreign emigrant population, German, Irish, French, Welsh, Spanish, Norwegian, Danish, and Dutch. The number in commission April 1, was 402.

The apportionment of colporteurs has been as follows: Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, East Vermont, and Canada East, (American Tract Society, Boston,) 20; West Vermont, 4; Rhode Island, 2; Connecticut, 7; New York, 87; New Jersey, 8; Pennsylvania, 86; Delaware, 3; Maryland, 17; District of Columbia, 1; Virginia, 70; North Carolina, 5; South Carolina, 4; Georgia, 22; Alabama, 10; Florida, 2; Louisiana, 8; Texas, 8; Mississippi, 7; Arkansas, 1; Tennessee, 24; Kentucky, 24; Ohio, 82; Michigan, 14; Indiana, 33; Illinois, 40; Missouri, 23; Iowa, 7; Wisconsin, 12; Canada 11; Mexico, 1; total, 643.

The Statistical Results show years of service, 264; number of families visited, 552,538; with 257,967 personal religious conversation or prayer was held; 13,199 public or prayer meetings were held or addressed; volumes sold, 488,624; books granted to destitute households, 137,115. The spiritual destitution of the fields thus traversed, will appear from the fact that 88,677 families habitually neglect evangelical preaching, making 1,560,000 souls reached within four years, who do not enjoy the instructions of the ministry; 62,442 families, during the year, were found destitute of all religious books except the Bible; 38,354 had not the Bible; and 51,462 were Roman Catholic families.

Twenty thousand dollars has been appropriated to the work of publishing in foreign lands.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, May 20, 1852.

DENOMINATIONAL SINS.

To remember the Sabbath day, in distinction from the first day of the week or any other day, is a duty which we as a denomination of people are trying to enforce upon all others; but to remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy—to count it a delight—to make it a season of communion with God, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words, is what (if the truth must be told) we are too careless about doing ourselves. In saying this, we give publicity to what our opponents of other persuasions may avail themselves of, for aught we know, and so hold us up to the odium of community. But we do not much care if they do. It is high time that something should take place which will bring our people to their senses. If they will not heed the reproofs which come from the faithful of their own denomination, then let the withering sarcasm of others fall upon them. Gladly would we cover the derelictions of our brethren; but when, in spite of milder cautions, and earnest appeals for consistency, which have, from time to time, been uttered in our columns, we see Sabbath profanation alarmingly on the increase, we consider it high time to speak out, though it be at the risk of exposing our denominational defects to others.

Our position is one which enables us to make pretty extensive observation. New York, being the center of business, calls many of our people to its marts; it lies, also, in the route of their travel from one section of the denomination to another. They must needs pass through this Samaria. So, if one comes from the North, and arranges it to reach Albany sometime on Sixth-day, and slip down the River that night, reaching our city about sunrise on Sabbath morning, we are pretty sure to hear of it. Or, if one from the East has passed the night on the Sound, it is very likely to come to our ears. True, he is here in ample time to attend public worship, and when he comes into the congregation, he appears as fair as the rest of the assembly. But, somehow or other, he is very apt to be greeted with, 'How do you do, brother?—very glad to see you; when did you come to town?' A rather troublesome question, to be sure; and it is amusing, (or would be, if it were not such a serious matter,) to see the efforts sometimes made to stammer out an apology for the transgression. However, it is got along with after a fashion, and the brother conducts himself very well, till it becomes convenient or profitable to transgress again. The next Sabbath, we see a brother who is known to have been in town several days. Very glad, indeed, are we to find that, though he has finished his business, he has too much reverence for God's law to take a part of the Sabbath for getting home, and we are on the point of commending him for it. But just at the moment, some one steps up, and puts the troublesome question, 'When do you leave the city, brother?' He intended to slip off quietly to Philadelphia by the 5 o'clock train of cars, or to Dunkirk by the 6 o'clock train—from one to two hours before the close of the Sabbath—and but for the impertinent question, might have done so without being detected. Ah, this spoils our estimation of his Christian integrity, very much. Things of this kind are constantly occurring, and the guilty persons are not always those who are "least esteemed in the church." Leading members, even deacons, and we are not quite sure but ministers also, are in the transgression.

These, however, are not the only forms of Sabbath profanation among us. Copartnerships with Sabbath-breakers, involving the transaction of business on the Sabbath day, are common among us. In some instances, these have been thoughtlessly formed, and obligations thereby incurred which cannot, it may be, be easily set aside. Of such we would speak leniently. But when we see others deliberately entered into, and the evil spreading, we are constrained to speak. The law of the Sabbath prohibits us to avail ourselves of the labors of either man-servant or maid-servant. But the agents employed in carrying on the business of a firm on the Sabbath day, are the servants of that firm. They are not the servants of one member of the firm, but of both, and the responsibility and guilt of employing them lies against both. Clear as the law is, however, and directly and explicity as it excludes the employment of every sort of agency in the transaction of business on the seventh day, our people seem determined on disobedience. They go on forming new partnerships, and seem not to care whether their influence in favor of the Sabbath amounts to any thing, if thy can only be in the way of making money.

And who is ignorant of the extent to which the Sabbath is profaned by visiting and gossip? We have our minds upon some communities among us, where this evil causes alarming deficiencies of attendance on public worship. Then add to all this loose conversation indulged in, the time spent in light and unprofitable reading, the consumption of the morning hours in unnecessary sleep, the performance of light work which might just as well have been attended to before, allowing the sixth day's work to lap over on the evening, and many other practices utterly inconsistent with "counting the Sabbath a delight;" and if any one can think that we are the people whom God has chosen to reform the world, we pity his infatuation.

For our own part, we have lost all faith in the competency of Seventh-day Baptists of the present day for the mission which they have undertaken; not because they are slack in publishing their views—though even in this respect there is room for improvement—but because their own want of reverence for sacred things neutralizes all their preaching. We do not believe that a people so ready to graduate their piety by their own convenience, are the ones to inculcate self-denial for the truth's sake upon others. A man who undertakes to keep the Sabbath, but is now and then bought off from his rigidness, when a sufficient price is paid, is not the man to preach, "Buy the truth and sell it not," to his fellow creatures. And we have too many such among us. Our tracts may be scattered upon the four winds of heaven, lecturers and colporteurs may traverse the country with the speed of the locomotive, till every nook and corner shall be reached with the testimony; but when all the world has heard the message, the next inquiry will be, 'What kind of people are they who have brought us this preaching?'

The truth is, we are not yet ready for our mission. And when we say not yet, we do not say it as intimating that it is necessary that we should be taken through a process of training, for months and years, before we can be ready, but simply to show the necessity of a radical reform. Length of time may not be necessary, before we can become harnessed for the war; a change—a resurrection from death to life—may be instantaneous. But without the change, it is vain to hope for any overturning in the community. Indeed, we should be sorry to see any extensive overturning, while Seventh-day Baptists are in the state they are. Our churches would not be suitable homes for those that would seek admission into them. The example of our people would be any thing but wholesome, and we very much fear that the few who have come to us within the last few years, have already suffered from the atmosphere which they have been compelled to breathe.

All this may be accounted pretty plain talk; and we mean it to be so, believing that there is necessity for it. Urgent as we are, however, for reform in the matter alluded to, our readers know that we do not make the whole of religion to consist in Sabbath-keeping. We have told them that, before. But we do believe, that the spirit which prompts to such a keeping of the holy rest as the prophet contemplated, when he said, "If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day; and call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honorable; and shalt honor him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words," is the true spirit of piety. No man can delight in those holy exercises, for one entire day, unless he is a regenerate person, and takes delight in the whole of religion. Yes, one single Sabbath, spent as it ought to be, would be evidential of that state of the heart which says, "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee." Hence, nothing is wanting but the true Sabbath-keeping spirit to make our people "the salt of the earth." Because they lack it, they are nothing in advance of others; nay, we fear, very much behind many. T. B. B.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

The Jew Question—Sunday Observance—Religion in France—Popish College, &c.

GLASGOW, April 23d, 1852.

The Court of Exchequer has, this week, given judgment against Mr. Salomons, in the case instituted to recover three penalties of £150 each, for his having sat and voted in the House of Commons without having taken the oaths in the prescribed form. The case is about to be carried to the highest judicial court in the realm for review; so that it is not absolutely decided, yet, that a Jew cannot sit as a representative. One of the four Judges in the Exchequer Court was in favor of his right, with the oath as Mr. S. took it.

Another movement is to be attempted for the enforcement of Sunday observance. The London Record urges the collection of money as alone necessary to insure success. We dis believe this, for there are motives which will not be so easily influenced leading onwards to secularization. The Newcastle and Carlisle Railway Company gives more than ordinary facilities for Sunday traveling, by granting return tickets for that day at reduced fares. At the meeting of shareholders, this month, after a motion had been made and negatived for the entire cessation of traffic on Sunday, another motion to run only the same trains on Sundays as on other days was also negatived by a large majority. But a new ally has come to aid the cause. The ultramontane Popish newspaper, The Universe, is calling loud for stricter Sunday observance in Paris and throughout France. Success in this effort would of course be a triumph for its Church's tradition—for, as their champion, Dr. Milner, in his End of Religious Controversy, declares, "Neither does the Scripture command us to keep the first day of the week, but the seventh, which was hallowed of God."

The Inspector-General of the Ministry of Police in France has addressed a circular to the Commissaries of Police, calling them to execute the law of February 17th, relative to the press, the bookselling business, and the hawkers of prints. The Commissaries are called actively to watch over the men who prowl through the towns and country places, "with books, pamphlets, and prints, hostile to the Chief of the State and his Government, and also contrary to religion and public morality. These hawkers are in general agents of subversive doctrines." The nature of the religion thus to be protected from all "subversive" measures, will be readily understood; for, at the ceremony of conferring the Cardinal's cap on the Archbishop of Bordeaux, the President intimidated the honor which he regarded it, to be "the emblem of the union which ought to exist between the spiritual and the temporal power." It is remarkable, in such circumstances, to be informed that "a Society has been lately formed at Paris for inquiring into the history and records of French Protestantism."

On being questioned in the House of Lords, this week, Earl Derby repeated his statement, that the Government has no intention at present of interfering with the grant to the Irish Popish College of Maynooth—although he confessed himself disappointed as to the effect produced by the putting that grant on its present footing. Mr. Spooner, who was to have made a motion on this subject in the House of Commons, has postponed it till the 4th of May, in consequence of the pressure of Parliamentary business. His motion is against the continuance of the grant as unnecessary and mischievous. On these points he is certainly right; for that college supports more than twice the number of priests which they require for this country; while treason against our liberties is inculcated there, and a large number of priests so educated, with our money, pass to the United States to curse them with Popish darkness and intolerance. The zeal they now display here is great. A priest, disguised as a mechanic, was lately detected discussing in a crowd at Liverpool the doctrines of the Church of Rome. Except, however, among the Tractarians of England, we believe, they are still making but little progress. The parish of Rugby has been a selected spot, on which they have devoted their energies, and they boasted to have made 300 converts. On full examination, the whole adults so perverted is found to be about 25. And, as a counterpoise, we have occasionally accounts of larger numbers (including of late not a few priests) who have renounced the errors of Popery.

The Arctic Expedition in search of Sir John Franklin has this week sailed—furnished with more effectual means for breaking up the ice and endeavoring to force their way up Wellington Channel. Immediately before their departure, Government has been vigorously engaged in probing an account of two vessels seen last year upon an iceberg, by a vessel on the voyage from Limerick to Quebec. They seemed to have been abandoned. The parties by whom they were seen are declared to be trustworthy persons; and it seems to be the impression of the intelligent officers engaged in prosecuting the inquiry, that these were the ships of our missing countrymen—although Mr. Penny gave a contrary opinion. He had, however, at the time, but a part of the evidence before him. The farther the inquiry has been carried, the more probable does it appear, that these were indeed the Erebus and Terror. They were not, however, boarded or closely approached, the Captain of the discovering vessel having at the time been sick. J. A. BEGG.

THE ANNIVERSARIES.

American Home Missionary Society.

The twenty-sixth Anniversary of this Society was held at the Tabernacle in New York, on the evening of Fourth-day, May 12, the President, Henry Dwight, Esq., in the chair. After the usual opening exercises, abstracts of the several reports were read, from which we gather the following facts:—

The Society has had in its service the last year, 1,065 ministers of the Gospel, in 28 different States and Territories; in the New England States, 305; the Middle States, 213; the Southern States, 14; the Western States and Territories, 533.

Of these, 619 have been the pastors or stated supplies of single congregations; and 446 have ministered to two or three congregations each, or occupied still wider fields; the itinerant system being embraced in the policy of the Society, as auxiliary to its great object—the permanent establishment of the pastoral relation.

Nine missionaries have preached to congregations of colored people; and 60 in foreign languages—13 to Welsh, and 39 to German congregations; and others to congregations of Norwegians, Swedes, Swiss, Hollanders and Frenchmen. The number of congregations supplied, in whole or in part, is 1,948; and the aggregate of ministerial servive performed is equal to 862 years.

The pupils in Sabbath Schools amount to 66,500.

There have been added to the churches, 6,820, viz: 3,810 on profession; and 3,010 by letter. Sixty-one missionaries make mention in their reports of revivals of religion in their congregations; and 349 missionaries report 2, 643 hopeful conversions.

Forty-five churches have been organized by the missionaries during the year; and forty-two that had been dependent have assumed the support of their own ministry.

Sixty-five houses of worship have been completed; fifty-five others repaired, and the building of sixty others commenced.

Ninety young men, in connection with the Missionary churches, are in preparation for the Gospel Ministry.

Receipts—$160,062 25. Liabilities—$174,263 77. Payments—$162,831 14—leaving $11,432 63 still due to missionaries for labor performed; towards canceling which, there is a balance in the Treasury of $9,907 15.

With the same number of laborers as were in commission the preceding year, eighteen more have been employed in the Western States and Territories; nine more years of missionary service have been performed; one hundred and twenty-eight more congregations have been blessed with the preaching of the Gospel; and one hundred and twenty-four more individuals have been added to the churches.

The receipts exceed those of the preceding year by $9,122 02—the greater part of the increase being from the regular contributions of the churches.

Female Guardian Society and Home for Friendless.

The eighteenth Anniversary of this institution was celebrated at the Church of the Puritans, Union-square, New York, Fourth-day evening, May 12, Rev. Dr. Tyng presiding and opening the proceedings with prayer.

The Treasurer's Report, and an abstract of the Annual Report, were read, from which we learn the following: Receipts for the current year, $15,490 32; Expenditures, $15,133 08; Balance in Treasury, $357 24.

After alluding to the motives that led to the organization of the Society, the Report states that through the press the Society has placed before the reading public an aggregate of 2,280,000 folio pages, and 285,335 smaller pages, thus silently making known their operations and results. Through the Register Office 1,913 applicants for the charity of work and wages have received attention, many of whom have been removed from the temptations of the City to a pleasant home in the country. 139 life members have been added to their list. The visitors among the out-door poor have bestowed upon the deserving and necessitous 3,480 articles of wearing apparel, &c., &c., and through their instrumentality many have been relieved from suffering and peril. The number of miles traversed by various Committees in carrying children to their appointed guardians has been 3,634. The Society, during the past year, has become free from debt, the last payment due upon the ground having been fully liquidated. The whole number of inmates sheltered by the institution since its commencement in July, 1847, has been 2,936: children, 1,146; adults, 1,790. Number of adults and children received the past year, including re-admission, 486: adults, 301; children, 185. The report concludes by citing many interesting illustrations of the good resulting from the labors of the Society, with encouraging letters from the children of the Home, and their guardians, and alludes to the wide doors of usefulness that are opened to this Association, not only in this City, but throughout the entire country.

American Bible Society.

The 36th Anniversary of this institution was held at the Broadway Tabernacle on Fifth-day. The following abstract of the Report of the managers will show what the Society has been doing the past year:—

There have been added to the Society during the year seventy-three Life Directors, 1,190 Life Members, and sixty-three Auxiliaries.

The receipts of the year, from all sources, amount to $308,744 81; being an increase of $31,842 28 beyond those of the previous year; and $24,130 67 more than was ever received before by the Society during any single year.

The number of Bibles printed during the same period is 239,000, and of Testaments 476,500, making a total of 706,500 copies.

The number of Bibles distributed is 221,450; and of Testaments 444,565, making a total for the year of 666,015. This is an increase of 73,583 over the issues of the previous year, and makes an aggregate, since the formation of the Society, of 8,238,982 Bibles and Testaments.

The Society has prepared a Royal Octavo Bible, in pica, for the use of families, and for the aged, who require a large letter; and a New Testament in French and English, in parallel columns. The Board has likewise published the books of Joshua, Judges, Ruth, I. Samuel, II. Samuel, and I. Kings, in the Choctaw tongue, under the direction of Rev. Cyrus Byington, of the Choctaw Mission, and the Gospel of John, in the Grebo language, for the Protestant Episcopal Mission in Western Africa.

The Collation of the English Bible, mentioned in the two previous Reports, is now completed, and an account of it will be furnished in the Report of the present year.

The Society has had in its employ 31 Agents through most of the year, including two in Texas and one in California.

Grants of Bibles and Testaments, in greatly increased numbers, have been made by the Board to local auxiliaries; to the various Missionary Boards; to Sunday Schools; to seamen and boatmen; to the blind, and to individuals for gratuitous distribution among the destitute, both at home and abroad.

Besides the grants of books, $30,900 has been granted by the Board in money to aid in publishing the Scriptures in foreign lands, especially in China, Northern and Southern India, and in Turkey, France, and Russia, under the direction of various Missionary Boards and Bible organizations.

The Society has purchase grounds and commenced the erection of a new Bible House in Astor-place, the present house being now quite too small. It will be 706 feet in circumference.

The American Board.

A meeting in behalf of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions was held in New York on Sixth-day morning, Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen in the Chair. After prayer, and a hymn by the congregation, a brief statement, from which we extract the following, was read by one of the Secretaries.

There are 33 missionaries and assistants now here, waiting to take their departure as soon as circumstances will allow. The receipts of the Board during the first nine months of last year, were $201,162 54, being an advance over that of the previous year by $6,243 61. It states that South India is ripening for a good harvest; that Dr. King is still at Athens; that the Sandwich Islands have received all that the Board could accomplish, but that fears are entertained of their suffering from an invasion similar to that of Cuba, unless the Government of the United States keep a good watch on the movement.

Rev. W. W. Scudder, of the Ceylon Mission, delivered an address on the encouragements and difficulties that come in the way of the Missionary in that country. He had been born in that Island, and consequently was acquainted with the country and the natives. The land of India has been one of interest for the last 2,000 years—pouring, during that period, her specie and gold, and wealth of every description, throughout the world. It was an avaricious desire to possess this land, that led to the discovery of the Cape of Good Hope and the New World, and finally the spread of the Gospel among the people. About two hundred years ago, a band of British merchants took possession of India, and such was their progress, that territory after territory was brought under their control, until the whole country fell into their hands. The sword of the Spirit followed the sword of the world, and Christianity was rapidly spread among the people. The reverend speaker gave a history of the different transactions that have taken place in India, together with a sketch of their manners and customs. The Hindoos are a religious people. Every act that they have to do during the day, is laid down in their Shaster, so that their ordinary duties are conducted in a religious spirit. When told he must die, the Hindoo calmly sits down, and breathes out his soul with the words, "It is God's will, it must be done." They also give largely in support of their religion. More than half a million of dollars are expended in one festival at a temple in Calcutta. Oh! if these noble traits were directed by the influence of the gospel, what a glorious result would follow, in the evangelization of the world! The gospel, however, has been preached and distributed throughout every part of the country; and in Ceylon the people are prepared to receive the word of God, but Missionaries are wanted to perfect the good work; and he called upon all present to aid in the conversion of India to the true God.

Rev. Cyrus Byington, of the Choctaw Mission, then rose, and spoke of the progress of Christianity among the red men of the West, besides giving an interesing description of their manners and ways of living. It seems that they carry out the principle of the Maine Liquor Law among the Creeks, for there they pay a man $2 for destroying one gallon of whisky. The number of Indians west of Arkansas is about 400,000, of which 10,000 are communicants. One hundred missionaries are engaged in laboring there.

Other addresses were delivered, for sketches of which we have not room.

Anti-Gambling Association.

This organization held a meeting in New York on Sixth-day evening last, at which addresses were delivered by the President, Rensselaer Havens, Esq., Rev. Mr. Clarke, Rev. Dr. Bacon, and Horace Greeley. The Association was organized in July, 1850, since which time it has received $3,655 76, and expended $4,193 50. The objects which it seeks to accomplish are stated as follows:—

To prevent, as far as practicable, the formation of gambling habits among the young, by the dissemination of facts, and by personal efforts with individuals known to be exposed to the temptations of the card-room, or the faro table.

To reclaim as many as possible of those victimized by gamesters; thus saving their friends from bitter sorrow, and themselves from early disgrace, and perhaps final ruin.

To protect merchants, manufacturers, bankers and chartered companies, to the widest attainable limit, from the frauds, embezzlements and losses incident to gambling practices.

To promote the enactment of suitable laws in all the States for the entire suppression of gambling-houses, lottery and policy offices, and the complete eradication of gambling from our country.

A PLEASANT CELEBRATION.—The fortieth anniversary of the installation of Dr. Daniel Sharp, as pastor of the Charles Street Baptist church, Boston was celebrated on Thursday, the 29th of April. After singing a hymn prepared for the occasion, an address was made by Dr. Peck, in which he spoke of the changes in the pastorate, and pronounced them unnecessary. A few well-timed remarks were then made to Dr. Sharp, to which he replied at length. "Much of his success as pastor," he said, "was connected with the efficient cooperation of the members of his church." Not one of those who took part in his installation forty years ago, were now living. A number of members had gone out from this church to aid in the formation of other interests in Boston, 200 communicants had died, and 25 persons had been sent out to preach the gospel. Dr. Stow followed in an affectionate address, and made a presentation to the Doctor of a magnificent silver flower vase and salver, in behalf of the Baptist ministers in Boston, in token of their esteem. After this, the assembly repaired to the vestry and partook of a collation. The afternoon was occupied by various persons, and among them ministers of other denominations, expressing their respect and affection for the venerable pastor.

RHENISH MISSION IN CHINA.—A letter from Rev. Mr. Bonny, at Whampoa, dated Dec. 17th, gives an interesting account of his visit to the Rhenish mission stations, on the main land about 50 miles below Whampoa. The mission has a central and three out stations. Besides preaching and lecturing to the people as opportunity is afforded, the missionaries have a prosperous school, in which, in addition to the ordinary branches of school knowledge, including music, vocal and instrumental, the Scriptures are made a regular class book. The mission has been quite successful. Sixty persons have been admitted to the church, and afford satisfactory evidence of their cordial reception of the doctrines and precepts of Christianity. The teachers dress in the Chinese style, and their instructions are all in Chinese.

RELIGION IN OREGON.—A writer from Oregon, in giving a sketch of religious matters there, has the following facts and figures:—

Population of the Territory, 20,000; M. E. Church ministers, 15; M. Protestant ministers, 4; Congregationalist ministers, 6; Baptist (missionary) ministers, 5; Baptist (anti-missionary) ministers, 6; Presbyterian (old and new) ministers, 4; Associate and Associate Reformed ministers, 3; Cumberland Presbyterian ministers, 4.

OLD FONTS IN USE.—Those old fonts in the English churches, which are the imperishable evidences of the ancient practice of immersion in England, are likely to come into use again. The Leeds (England) Mercury says that at Bradford parish church, a short time ago, "the somewhat unusual circumstance occurred of baptism being performed by immersion. The rite was administered by the Rev. Dr. Burnet, the recipient being a young lady about 16 years of age. The large stone font, weighing several tons, and which is usually kept beneath the tower, was made available on the occasion." [Watchman & Reflector.

THE AMERICAN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY, of which Wm. Lloyd Garrison is President, held its Anniversary at Rochester last week. The subjects discussed were much the same as have been reported in notices of its previous anniversaries—the inherent sinfulness of slavery, the guilt of the church and the clergy in not putting an end to it, and the inconsistency of swearing allegiance to or holding office under the Constitution of the United States. The Fugitive Slave Law and the American Colonization Society also came in for a share of attention. The following resolutions upon the Fugitive Slave Law were eloquently discussed, and the severest denunciations of the law uttered by the speakers were most enthusiastically cheered by the crowded assembly:—

Resolved, That here, so near the residence of that man whose eternal infamy it will be, that his signature, as President of the United States, is affixed to the Fugitive Slave bill, we denounce that law as the most cruel and monstrous legislation that has for centuries disgraced the statute book of any nation.

Resolved, That we do not stop to ask whether this law be constitutional or unconstitutional, essential or not to the preservation of the Union; enough for us that it is the cruel mockery of all justice, inhuman, anti-Christian, diabolical; and, trampling it under our feet for ourselves, we declare that as far as in us lies it never shall be executed.

While the Convention was in session, an attempt was made to arrest three fugitive slaves who happened to be in Rochester at that time, but who, on learning the designs of their pursuers, took passage for Canada by the under-ground railroad, and so escaped.

TRACT OPERATIONS ON THE PACIFIC.—At San Francisco, a short time ago, the Pacific Tract Society held its second anniversary. Tracts in English and Spanish have been distributed the entire length of the State—the pincipal towns, the mining and agricultural districts, have been supplied, and correspondence opened with gentlemen from every section of the State. During the past year, 1,560,000 pages of tracts in various languages, have been circulated among the people by the Society, being an increase of 451,776 pages over the preceding year. The finances of Society are represented to be in a somewhat embarrassed condition, which the Report ascribes partly to the fire of June, which consumed the Tract House and involved a loss of some $2,300.

ARCHBISHOP HUGHES NOT A CARDINAL.—A correspondent of the St. Louis Intelligencer, writing from Rome on the 20th of March, notes the creation of four Cardinals, and says:

"To settle the matter about Bishop Hughes, I may say here, that I learn from several sources that the Pope has said he should appoint none for the United States but a native American, and that the honor was properly due to Maryland, as the State settled by Roman Catholics. There is no talk, at present, of making an American Cardinal, but some Bishop of Baltimore may reasonably expect the honor in the course of a few years."

THE MAINE LAW IN RHODE ISLAND.—The Newport (R. I.) Daily News thus notifies friends and foes that the Maine Law is to be openly defied in that town:—

"We desire that people abroad should distinctly understand, that our usual summer visitors can obtain just as much liquor as they want, and just as freely as they have heretofore had it. Let them come, as usual, and they will find that our assurance is entirely reliable and fully correct. We shall have more to say on this subject hereafter. In the mean time, our friends of the press abroad will confer a favor upon us by making these facts known."

CAMP-MEETINGS IN CALIFORNIA.—The Methodists are quite active in California. An item of news by the late arrival, states that they were about to commence a series of camp meetings. The first will be held near Sonoma; the second at Santa Cruz; the third on San Jose Circuit; and the fourth at Stockton. There will be others in the mining districts; one at Volcano.

The site selected for the Universalist College, is on Walnut Hill, in Somerville, Mass., close by the Lowell railroad, an eminence commanding extensive prospects of Boston and the surrounding country. The land, valued at $20,000, has been given, and there is a fund of $100,000. Within a few miles around, there are about twenty congregations professing the Universalist faith.

The Western Episcopalian says that the title to the lands on which Jubilee College, Peoria county, Ill., is situated, has passed from Bishop Chase and the institution. It has been for some time in litigation, and in the lower courts the judgment was in favor of the bishop; but this, it now seems, has been reversed.

The Baptists of Mississippi resolved, at the last anniversary of their Convention, to raise $100,000 for Clinton College, and to appoint a financial agent for this purpose. There are already two female colleges in Mississippi, under Baptist influence—one at Hernando and the other at Pontotoc.

Our English papers inform us that Mr. Wm. Hughes, a dissenter in London, has had his property distrained to the amount of £20 7s. 3d. for the purpose of supporting the services of the Church of England, upon which he does not attend, and to which he has conscientious objections.

Intelligence has been received of the decease of Rev. Harvey M. Campbell, of the Arracan mission. He died of cholera on the 22d of February. Mr. Campbell was a theological graduate from Madison University in 1848.

It is estimated that there have been one thousand and thirty hopeful conversions in the thirty-three evangelical churches in Boston within a few weeks past.

The remains of Dr. Staughton were removed a few days since from the burial ground of the Sansom street church, Philadelphia, to the Laurel Hill Cemetery.

Twenty-eight thousand dollars have been subscribed by the Methodist Protestants of Alabama, for the establishment of a college in the vicinity of Montgomery in that State.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, MAY 10.

The SENATE had under consideration, and ordered engrossed, several bills granting lands for railroad purposes. A bill was passed, authorizing the Legislature of Mississippi to sell the lands heretofore appropriated for the use of Schools in that State, and approving the sales already made. The Deficiency Bill was taken up, and Collins steamers were discussed. Mr. Wade of Ohio made a speech in opposition. Messrs. Rusk, Cass and Bayard supported the motion. Without closing the debate, the Senate adjourned.

In the HOUSE, the Homestead Bill was pushed a little; a host of amendments were voted down in Committee, and the first section finally remains exactly as it came from the Committee on Public Lands, viz: "That every man or widow who is the head of a family, and a citizen of the United States, shall from and after the passage of this act be entitled to enter, free of cost, one quarter section of vacant and unappropriated public lands, or a quantity equal thereto, to be located in a body in conformity with the legal subdivisions of the public lands, and after the same shall have been surveyed." Then, after some boys play about a recess for fitting up the House in summer trim, the members went to dinner.

THIRD-DAY, MAY 11.

In the SENATE's proceedings we see nothing to note except the presentation of several petitions against Sunday mails, and a discussion upon the Collins steamers.

The HOUSE adopted a resolution to take a recess from the 13th to the 17th inst., in order that the officers of the House may clean and refit the Hall for summer use. The HOUSE then went into Committee on the Homestead bill, when various amendments were offered, debated, and all voted down. Mr. Brown (Miss.) offered a substitute for the bill, proposing to perpetuate the rights of pre-empters—that is to say, persons acquiring the right of pre-emption, shall retain the same without disturbance or payment of any kind, on certain conditions. Pending the question on Mr. Brown's substitute, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

FOURTH-DAY, MAY 12.

In the SENATE, among the numerous petitions presented was one in favor of a grant of lands to certain Hungarians who have settled in Iowa. Mr. Rusk gave notice of a bill to reduce the rates of postage on newspapers and other printed matter, and regulate the salaries of Postmasters. Mr. Brodhead reported a bill making it a penal offense for any officer of the Army to be interested in any contract for supplies for the Army. Mr. Gwin introduced a bill granting land to California for a railroad from San Francisco to San Jose. Considerable time was then spent in talk about the landing of the U. S. Troops at Vera Cruz; after which the Deficiency Bill was taken up, and the Collins steamer item occupied the remainder of the day.

The HOUSE spent the early part of the day in talking, without voting, on the Public Printing and the Cleaning of the House. The Homestead Bill was then taken up, and after disposing of several amendments the Bill was passed by a vote of 108 to 57. We give an abstract of the bill as passed:—

Article 1st provides that any person who is the head of a family and a citizen of the United States, or any person who is the head of a family and had become a citizen prior to the 1st day of January, 1852, as required by the naturalization laws of the United States, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be entitled to enter, free of cost, one quarter section of vacant and unappropriated public lands, or a quantity equal thereto, to be located in a body, in conformity with the legal subdivisions of the public lands, and after the same shall have been surveyed.

2d. The person applying for the benefit of the act, to make an affidavit that he or she is the head of a family, and is not the owner of any estate in land at the time of such application, and has not disposed of any estate in land to obtain the benefit of the act.

3d. section refers to the duties of the Land Register.

4th. All lands acquired under the provisions of the act shall in no event become liable for the satisfaction of any debt or debts contracted prior to the issuing of the patent therefor.

5th. If at any time after filing the affidavit required, and before the expiration of five years, it shall be proven that the person locating on such lands shall have changed his or her residence, or abandoned the said entry for more than six months at any one time, then the land to revert back to the Government, and be disposed of as other public lands are now by law.

6th. If any individual now a resident of any State or Territory, and not a citizen of the United States, but at the time of making application for the benefit of the act shall have filed a declaration of intention so to do, as required by the naturalization laws of the United States, and shall become a citizen of the same before the issuing of the patent, as made and provided for in this act, he shall be placed upon an equal footing with the native born citizen.

7th. No individual is permitted to make more than one entry under this act.

FIFTH-DAY, MAY 13.

The SENATE listened to the reading of several petitions, not of general interest. The Homestead Bill from the House was received, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands. The Deficiency Bill was taken up, the Collins steamer item was informally passed over, a number of minor amendments were agreed to, and the Senate adjourned after considering for a while a trifling item of $355,000 for Indian depredations in Georgia, Alabama and Florida.

The HOUSE did nothing but adjourn over to Second-day to have the Hall cleaned.

SIXTH-DAY, MAY 14.

The SENATE only was in Session, and not much done there except political speech-making. The Deficiency Bill was briefly discussed, an item relating to the Creek Indians principally occupying attention.

MASSACRE IN SITKA, OREGON.—On the 22d of March fifty Indians of the Starkin tribe visited the Sitka (or Colusa) tribe by special invitation, and while engaged in a dance, were attacked by the Sitkas, and forty-six of their number inhumanly murdered. The other four made their escape, and had not been found when the Backus sailed. It was supposed that the Starkins, who number some 5,000 warriors, would attack the Sitkas, whose force does not exceed 2,000, and exterminate the whole tribe for this act of cruel treachery. Mr. Young reports the Indians to be very hostile, but under a good state of subjection to the Russians, who have a stockade fort in the town, half of which is occupied by them, and the other part by the Indians. After the ringing of a bell at a given hour, the Indians are not allowed in the portion occupied by the Russians.

California News.

The steamship Daniel Webster, from San Juan, with California news to April 16, arrived at New York on Sunday, May 16.

Numerous bloody conflicts between the whites and Indians are reported by this arrival. In one on Klamath River, forty Indians were killed, and all of their houses were burnt to the ground. In another, on the Colorado, six soldiers and one citizen were killed by the Indians.

The California market is glutted with goods of all kinds. There is a scarcity of seamen among the shipping, owing to desertion.

There is not much news of interest from the mines. New diggings are reported as having been discovered in Rogue River Valley. The finest specimen of gold ever seen has been deposited in Adams' Express office. It is solid gold, and weighs 305 oz. 11½ pwts. It was dug at Bayecito, on the 24th ult., by W. L. Durham, from a hole 54 feet deep. This is the largest lump of pure gold ever yet found in California.

Of crimes and casualties, an unusual number are reported. We give a few specimens:

A man named Colton, said to be from New York, where he has a wife and child, was shot at the Alta gambling saloon, Grass Valley, on the 3d.

Mr. George Robinson was accidentally shot at Mad Mule Canon, and died in a few minutes.

A negro named Charles Dewitt was shot by a white man named J. C. Davis, at San Andres, on Sunday.

The body of John Craig, of Oneida County, N. Y., has been found in the South Fork of the American River, twenty miles from Placerville.

From the Ione Valley a party of Mexicans stole a horse. As soon as the loss became known, a party started in pursuit, and overtook the thieves at the forks of the Cosumes, where a desperate fight immediately ensued, the Mexicans being larger in force than the Americans, and well armed. In the melee, one Mexican was killed and several wounded. Mr. Clark, one of the party in pursuit, was killed, and Mr. James Corcoran badly wounded in the leg.

Jose Valinzuela, says the San Gabriel Star, was convicted of horse stealing before Michael White, Esq., at San Gabriel, on Monday. The sentence was two months' imprisonment in the county jail, and 39 lashes on the bare back.

The San Gabriel Star of the 3d says: Just as we go to press we learn that an Indian was hung by the citizens of San Gabriel, this morning, for murdering another Indian last evening.

The Stockton Times says an officers' posse from Columbia had arrested a Mexican, for theft, at a camp called Humbug, on Wood's Creek, three miles above Sonora, and were conveying him to the former place, to be tried, when they were suddenly surprised by a party of Mexicans, who attempted a rescue. Several shots were fired by the Mexicans, but without effect. The Americans returned the fire, and two Mexicans fell, one of them mortally, and the other severely wounded. The Mexicans fled, leaving these two in the hands of the Americans. The prisoner escaped.

A Mexican was hung by Lynch Law, on the evening of the 5th, at Campo Seco. Three men were murdered, about the month of December last, in that vicinity. The Mexican was proved to be one of the murderers.

There were two more arrivals at San Francisco on Sunday, and one on Monday, from Hong-Kong—the Glenyon with 150, the Emperor with 181, and the George Washington with 185 Chinese passengers—total 516, which, added to the 1126, before noted as having arrived during the past fortnight, shows an addition of 1642 Chinamen in little over two weeks. Many more are on their way, while a whole fleet of vessels was at latest dates taking in passengers at Hong-Kong.

Volcano in the Sandwich Islands.

From a recent Sandwich Island Paper.

By an accurate measurement of the enormous jet of glowing lava where it first broke forth on the side of Mauna Loa, it was ascertained to be 500 feet high! This was upon the supposition that it was 30 miles distant. We are of the opinion that it was a greater distance, say from 40 to 60 miles. With a glass, the play of this jet, at night, was distinctly observed, and a more sublime sight can scarcely be imagined. A column of molten lava, glowing with the most intense heat, and projected into the air to a distance of 500 feet, was a sight so rare, and at the same time so awfully grand, as to excite the most lively feelings of awe and admiration, even when viewed at a distance of 40 to 50 miles. The diameter of this jet is supposed to be over a hundred feet!

In some places this river is a mile wide, and in others more contracted. At some points it has filled up ravines of 100, 200, and 300 feet in depth; and still it flowed on. It enters a heavy forest, and the giant growth of centuries are cut down before it, like grass before the mower's scythe! No obstacle can arrest it in its descent to the sea. Mounds are covered over—ravines are filled up—forests are destroyed, and the habitations of man are consumed like flax in the furnace. Truly, "He toucheth the hills and they smoke."

We have not yet heard of any destruction of life from the eruption in progress. A rumor has reached us that a small native village has been destroyed, but of this we have no authentic intelligence.

Two vessels had sailed for Hilo, both filled to their utmost capacity, with people who desired to witness this great eruption.

The eruption seems to have broken out through an old fissure, about one-third down the side of Mauna Loa, on the north-west side, and not from the old crater on the summit, Mokuoweoweo. The altitude of the present eruption is about 10,000 feet above the level of the sea, and from the Bay of Hilo (Byron's Bay) must be some 50 or 60 miles. If it succeeded in reaching the ocean at the point supposed, after having filled up all the ravines, gulches, and inequalities of a broken country, it will undoubtedly be one of the most extensive eruptions of modern times.

European News.

By the steamer Canada, and the telegraph from Halifax, European news to May 1, was received in New York May 12.

The Collins steamer Atlantic, on the 28th April, ran aground about 2 P. M. in a dense fog inside the Salte, and about a mile from the pier of Killmore, but got off about 9 P. M., apparently without damage, and arrived at Liverpool on Thursday, the 29th, about 1 o'clock P. M.

The steamship Great Britain sailed from Liverpool for New York May 1st, with 160 passengers.

The British House of Commons was occupied on Wednesday, April 28, in discussing a measure proposing to abolish religious tests in the Scotch University. After a lengthened discussion, the measure was negatived by 15 majority.

The Commons the same day had before them a motion to regulate the revenues of the Church. Leave was given to bring in a bill on this subject.

Mr. Heywood's motion for a Committee to consider the propriety of preserving the Crystal Palace came up, and a long debate ensued, which resulted, upon a division—103 for the Committee to 221 against it. So the Palace will be pulled down, and its demolition was to commence on the 1st of May, the anniversary of its opening.

On Friday, according to announcement, the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought forward the budget. It proposes to repeal none of the existing taxes, and says nothing of imposing new, except the continuation of the Income and Property tax for a limited time, and estimates that the income of the coming year will be from present sources £51,625,000, and the expenditure £51,163,979, which will leave a surplus of £461,221.

The London papers contain a sickening narrative of the sufferings and death by starvation of a missionary party in the island of Picton, off Cape Horn.

The expedition against the Burmese goes on apace. A battle of three hours' duration had been fought between twenty-five hundred British troops and a body of native mountaineers. Mountaineers defeated.

Further advices received from the Cape of Good Hope mention the occurrence of some skirmishing.

President Roberts' inaugural address on his third re-election to the Presidency of Liberia, has reached England. It represents in general terms the Colony as flourishing, but the late attack on Bassa Cool has caused a deficiency of $2,000 in the Revenues.

The Electric Telegraph is almost completed between Galway and Dublin, to connect with the Submarine Line to England.

Government declines to take possession of the newly-discovered guano island of Lobos. The refusal excites a good deal of irritation among the shippers and agriculturists.

The British ship-of-war Herald is fitting out for an Exploring Expedition to the South Seas.

Four Days Later.

The Collins Steamer Atlantic, with Liverpool dates to May 5, arrived at New York on Sunday, May 16. The news is not important.

The Agricultural Reporter of the Belfast Mercury says, It is probable that not less than 250,000 acres will be under potato crop in Ulster, Ireland, by the second week in May. Great care was taken of the seed during the winter months, and the prospects of this season's growth are more favorable than any since 1847.

Paris papers of Sunday, May 2, say that the refusals to take the oath to the Constitution and the President, are more numerous than was expected. In several of the departments, Members of the Council General have refused to take the oath, as also some of the functionaries of the Tribunals of Commerce. At Evreux, the functions of the Tribunal have been suspended in consequence of the refusal.

We find in the Piedmontese Gazette, of April 27th, an official account of the explosion of the powder manufactory at Turin. It took place at 11¾ o'clock A. M., at the moment when the workmen were going away. The explosion was caused by the spontaneous combustion of a mixture intended for mining powder, contained in an open vat. The number of persons killed was 14, and 21 wounded. They were crossing the canal at the time to go to their meals, when they were overwhelmed by the fragments which fell in all directions.

There was a smart shock of earthquake at St. Michaels (Azores) on the night of the 16th April. The north of the island suffered severely; many lives were lost, and houses destroyed.

Dispatches by the Overland Mail from India, via Marseilles, contain little beyond that brought by the Canada, except details of the movements of troops destined for the expedition against the Burmese. The battle referred to in the telegraphic summary, appears to have been a frontier engagement, in which some 100 were killed.

Arrangements have been made between the British and Egyptian Governments, by which the latter undertakes the conveyance of the India and China mails across the country; the homeward mail from Suez to Alexandria in 70 hours, and the outward from Alexandria to Suez in 75 hours, thus effecting a saving of 10 to 12 hours. For this service, the British Post-Office is to pay the Egyptian Government £6,000 per annum.

The steamship Great Britian, under the command of Capt. B. Matthews, arrived at New York, May 13. She left the Wellington Dock, Liverpool, at 9 o'clock on the morning of the 1st inst., and made the passage in about 13 days and three hours. It is now five years since the Great Britian appeared in our waters. She is constructed of iron, and her appointments are now all more complete than they were before the accident at Dundrum Bay, on the coast of Ireland. She brings, beside a full cargo, one hundred and sixty passengers.

George League, of Baltimore, has brought two suits, of $30,000 each, against Joseph Creamer, for the seduction of his daughter.

SUMMARY.

A dispatch dated Albany, Thursday, June 13, 1852, says: The Controller has decided that he cannot, under the decision of the Court of Appeals, pay the interest on the Canal Revenue Certificates. The Attorney-General, I understand, will call upon the Banks to take up the Revenue Certificates in the Controller's office, and supply the place with other stocks, or return the circulating notes.

A young woman employed at the Mint in Philadelphia, who had been deaf and dumb for several years, occasioned by scarlet fever, a few days since, while engaged at her usual occupation, exclaimed, "Oh, I believe I can speak." The astonishment of those in the apartment with her was so great that one of the females fainted, and most of them were surprised beyond measure. She has since entirely recovered her speech.

In Baltimore, one day last week, Mr League, a merchant, leveled a double barreled rifle at the breast of Joseph Creamer, a young man who seduced his daughter, and two weeks since married another lady. One ball shattered the stock of a revolver in the breast pocket of Mr. Creamer, the other grazed his breast and passed through his right arm. The seduction had been town talk for some months, and the rencoutre had been generally anticipated.

Letters from the Coast of Africa state that the town of Whydah has been recently burnt, together with Hutton's factory. After the fire, there were discovered in the ruins of the town the charred remains of 150 slaves, who had been unable to escape, owing to their being chained together by the neck. It is supposed they were collected together ready for shipping. The town of Dahomey, where the King of that country resides, is also reported to have been burnt.

The Louisiana Legislature has passed a law prohibiting the emancipation of slaves in that State, except on condition of their being sent out of the United States. A bill recently reported in the Maryland Legislature has a similar provision. A very stringent bill against free negroes has been reported in the Virginia Legislature, the enforcement of which will drive them out of the State.

The Petersburgh (Va.) Gazette states that Mr. Tyler, of that place, has recently dispatched to the seaboard the following quantities of skins and furs, collected by him during the past winter in the tier counties lying between the Ohio River and the Alleghany Mountains: Raccoon, about 27,000; mink, 4,500; red fox, 1,000; gray fox, 5,500; wildcat, 3,000; otter and fisher, 400; opossum, 6,500; bear, 500; deer, 6,000.

A telegraphic dispatch, received at the office of the Detroit Advertiser on the 11th inst., reports that the Government Stock Bank of Michigan, located at Ann Arbor, had that day refused to redeem a large amount of its notes presented by the agents of the Metropolitan Bank in New York. These notes are all secured by Government Stock, and are perfectly safe. The affair is simply a fight between the Metropolitan Bank and a brokerage house.

Some excitement has been created at Richmond, Va., in consequence of Governor Johnson having commuted the punishment of death to that of banishment from the State, in the case of a slave named Jordan, who, on being whipped by an overseer for bad work and disobedience, had risen against and killed him, for which crime he had been regularly tried and sentenced to be hanged.

Mrs. Catharine Schooly, who is represented as the largest woman in the world, is holding levees in Columbus. She is a native of Pickaway County, Ohio, 36 years of age, and weighs 611 pounds. The advertisement further says: "Her size around the body is 10 feet 4 inches; around the arm 3 feet 2 inches; around the thigh, 4 feet 11 inches; hight, 5 feet 2 inches."

A St. Louis paper says: We were shown a large batch of a new issue of promises to pay styled the Omnibus Banking Company, dated and purporting to have been issued in the City of New York, some time during the past month, and signed by Case & Co., redeemable at Bellview, town. It is needless to say there is no such Bank in New York.

The Savannah Georgian mentions a horrible outrage perpetrated by a negro man, who made his escape, and adds that he was pursued by a party of "gentleman with dogs, who, it is earnestly hoped, may accomplish his arrest." Various modes of executing legal process evidently prevail in the different States of the Union.

Dolbear's Journal and Clarksburg (Va.) Democrat of the 9th ult. gives an acccount of the death and burial of Henry Critzer, a Revolutionary soldier, aged 94. He was a native of New Jersey, served through the War of Independence, and had been a resident of Harrison County and its vicinity for sixty years.

One of the latest freaks of the noted Feargus O'Connor was stalking into the Superior Court-Room, in New York, while that dignified body was in session, and coolly taking a seat on the bench by the side of Judge Sandford. After a full look at the audience and the Court, Mr. O'C. silently walked out.

The Patriot announces that three students have been expelled from a college in England—the Congregationalist—for having denied the plenary inspiration of the Bible, and for having distinctly avowed their conviction that the ultimate standard of appeal in matters of belief is the individual conscience, and not the written record of revelation.

Once a week, the Boston Courier publishes the asking and offering prices of the stock of about forty Manufacturing Companies in New England. In their paper of Wednesday, only nine Companies are quoted as high as par, and the price offered for the stock of several is as low as thirty and sixty cents on the dollar.

As the emigrant train on the Michigan Central Railroad, going west, was stopping at Niles, a second train, which left Detroit about the same time, overtook and ran into the emigrant train, killing three persons, and severely injuring several others. The accident was owing to the carelessness of the engineers.

The Builder says that green cucumber peelings will effectually destroy cockroaches. Spread the peel for several nights successively, in the parts of the house where they appear, and they will flock to it and suck its juices until they are poisoned to death.

On Thursday a four-horse team belonging to the Harlem Railroad company ran away from the depot in Thirty-second-st. New York, down the Fourth avenue. When near Thirty-first-st. they ran against another four-horse team attached to a passenger car going up. All eight horses fell, and three were killed almost instantly. No other damage done.

A letter from Matanzas, quoted by the Charleston Evening News, under date of the 23d ult., says the American brig Hanover landed eight hundred slaves on the island a short time before, having been brought from the coast of Africa. The Hanover was fitted out in the port of New York.

In the Massachusetts House, May 15th, the bill for the further protection of personal liberty came up on its engrossment, and was defeated by 11 majority. The bill, had it become a law, would have conflicted directly with the Fugitive Slave Law.

The Mount Morris dam, on the Genesee Valley Canal, near Rochester, was again washed away May 13. It will take at least two weeks to repair it, and the expense will be very great. Over 10,000 barrels of flour, and a large quantity of wheat, are kept from going forward by this disaster.

A monster trial is about to come on at the Weimar Assizes in Prussia. Fifty three of a band of some two hundred individuals who, in 1848, crossed the Prussian frontiers, and plundered a landholder and his family of all his papers, deeds and leases, have been discovered.

The work on the Canandaigua and Niagara Falls Road is being pushed with great energy. Gangs of men are at work on the entire line from Canandaigua to Batavia, and it is anticipated that the cars will be run over that portion of the road in December next.

The whites of South Carolina have multiplied from 142,019 in 1790, to 274,623 in 1850, or at the rate of 93 per cent.; the whites of Massachusetts in the same period have multiplied from 384,984 to 994,499, or at the rate of 193 per cent.

On Tuesday afternoon, May 11, the barn of Joseph Potter, Esq., of Potter's Hill, R. I., was destroyed by fire. A stack of hay near by was burned at the same time. The barn was set on fire by some children playing near.

In 1851 three hundred and sixty millions of letters passed through the English post-office; in 1830 the number was only seventy-six millions. So much for cheap postage, increase of population, and intelligence.

The U. S. frigate Cumberland is said to be under orders for Greece, to demand an explanation from that Government for the oppressive treatment to which Rev. Mr. King has been subjected.

The power of Jenny Lind's voice may be, in some measure, understood, when it is stated that it was distinctly heard more than a quarter of a mile from the Town Hall on the evening of her concert in Northampton.

French's Hotel, corner of Chatham and Frankfort streets, New York, was injured by fire on the 13th inst., to the amount of about $40,000. A man connected with the house as carpenter, was burnt to death.

DIED,

In Leonardsville, N. Y., on the 9th inst., Mrs. CAROLINE MAXSON, wife of Mr. Truman B. Maxson, aged 31 years. Mrs. M. was a descendant of the venerable Rev. William Bliss, of the third generation, and granddaughter of the present Deacon Jeremiah Bliss, of Newport, R. I. Her mother, Susan Bliss, married the late Thomas Coon, of DeRuyter, N. Y., where Mrs. M. was born, and passed her early life. When quite young, she became a subject of Divine grace and, united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in DeRuyter, with which she remained a member until death. The disease of which she died, was nervous and spasmodic, resulting in mental aberrations and coma. We trust that she has died the death of the righteous, and that her last end is like his. W. B. M.

In Newport, R. I., April 14th, Mrs. SARAH, relict of the late Mr. John Maxson, in the 85th year of her age. She had been for fifty-seven years a worthy member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Newport. "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord."

In Verona, N. Y., May 4th, of inflammation on the brain, EMILY, daughter of George and Jemima Gardner, aged 9 years. C. C.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM. DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

WILLIAM DUNN, A. D. TITSWORTH, Jr.
JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

To Boston via Norwich and Worcester.

THE first-class Sound steamers CONNECTICUT and KNICKERBOCKER leave Pier 18, N. R., foot of Courtland-st., New York, forming the great United States and British Mail Line for Boston, Montreal, Quebec, Lowell, and Nashua, via Norwich and Worcester. Fare to New London $2; to Worcester $3; to Boston $4; to Bellows' Falls, Vt., $5; to Burlington $7; to Rowse's Point $8. Through tickets to Montreal $9 50.

The pier from which this line starts is the most contiguous of any occupied by the Sound Lines, to the Astor House, Irving House, Howard Hotel, Rathbun's Hotel, and the numerous Hotels in Courtland-st. and its vicinity. The passage affords a fine view of the Hudson and East Rivers, and the Route being Inland, avoids the uncomfortable passage round Point Judith, and through Fisher's Island Sound. Passengers can if they prefer, arrive in Boston at an early hour, by the Steamboat Train, or have the privilege of remaining and breakfasting on board the Steamers, and take the early train from Norwich to Boston; thus making the hour of arrival equally accommodated to pleasure and business travel.

Central Railroad of New Jersey.

Returning, leave Clinton at 8.15 A. M., 12.30 P. M.; White House at 3.15 (freight) and 5.40 and 8.40 A. M., and 1.40 P. M.; Somerville at 4 (freight) and 6.05 and 9.05 A. M., and 2.05 P. M.; Plainfield at 5.10 (freight) and 6.40 and 9.45 A. M., and 2.40 P. M.; Elizabethtown at 7.15 and 10.30 A. M., and 3.15 P. M.

Passengers for Easton, Bethlehem, Allentown, Wilkesbarre, and Maunch Chunk, Pa., and Flemington, N. Germantown, N. J., will take the 9 A. M. train from New York, and on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, for New Hampton, Washington, Belvidere, N. J. Stages leave Somerville daily for Peapack and Pluckamine on the arrival of the 1 P. M. train. All baggage at the risk of the owners, until delivered into the actual possession of the agents of the Company, and checks or receipts given therefor.

New Printing Materials.

NEW Building, No. 29 Beekman street, between Nassau and William streets, near the City Hall, Park, and principal hotels, New York. The undersigned beg respectfully to inform their patrons and the trade, that they have removed to their new building, No. 29 Beekman street, between Nassau and William streets. They trust, from the facilities there offered, by every modern improvement, to meet a continuance of liberal support. Fonts of plain Scotch faces, ranging from 100 lbs. to 1,000 lbs. weight, will be kept on hand, as well as a varied assortment of Fancy Letter, and every article necessary for the furnishing of complete printing offices. The subscribers would beg to call the attention of the trade to their metal, which, for durability, has not been surpassed, if equaled, by any foundry in the United States. By a peculiar combination of metals, arrived at from an experience of thirty years, they are enabled to cast type which they feel assured will last one-third longer than that heretofore furnished by any other foundry in the country. In proof of this, they would state, that the last dress of this paper [the New York Herald] lasted upwards of one year, averaging a daily circulation all the year, including Sundays, besides extras, of 35,000 copies; and this on their rotary cylinder presses—thus evidencing conclusively the fact of durability.

Each number of the Memorial will contain a lithographic portrait of a Seventh-day Baptist preacher, together with a variety of historical, biographical, and statistical matter, designed to illustrate the rise, progress, and present condition of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. Wood-cuts of meeting-houses will be introduced from time to time in connection with the history of the churches.

The Cranberry.

This delicious fruit is coming into general use, and is becoming an important article of export, and much interest is now taken in its cultivation.

The common American Cranberry (oxycoccus macrocarpus,) is found growing in a wild state in swampy soils, in the Eastern, Middle and Western States. The first account we have of the cultivation of this fruit, is by the late Sir Joseph Banks, who, in 1813, produced from a bed 18 feet square, three and a half Winchester bushels, being at the rate of 460 bushels to the acre.

As this plant naturally grows in a very wet soil, it is generally supposed that it will not thrive in a dry soil; but this is erroneous, Mr. Bates, of Bellington, Mass., having cultivated the cranberry on a dry soil for several years, with the utmost success.

His method is to plow the land, spread on a quantity of swamp muck, and after harrowing the soil thoroughly, set out the plants in drills, 20 inches apart, hoeing them the first season. After this no cultivation is needed.

From a knowledge of the cranberry for the last thirty years, we would recommend to those designing the cultivation of this fruit on an extended scale, the trial of both swampy and dry soil—draining the swampy soil, ploughing it as early as possible, and setting out the plants after the plan of Mr. Bates.

In Massachusetts, the cranberry crop is, once in a few years, cut off by the late spring frosts. This may be prevented where a meadow is so situated as to be flowed. The water should not be over 1 or 2 inches deep on the cranberries, nor be left on later than the last of May in this climate. If kept on till it becomes warm, it will kill the vines. Perhaps the best management would be something as they flood rice fields at the south, or water meadows in England. Let the water on while the weather is coldest, and take it off as it moderates. Sometimes, in the Eastern States, the cranberries are destroyed by a frost in September; where water is convenient and plenty, the meadow could be flowed on cold nights at this season, as well as in spring.

Previous to shipping cranberries, they should be run over a platform slightly inclined. The rotten and bruised fruit will not run off, but stick going down the platform, and are scraped off and thrown away. The perfect fruit is then put into tight barrels, and when headed up, filled with water; in this manner they arrive in Europe in perfect order, and have frequently sold in foreign ports at $20 per barrel.

Rakes are now made for the express purpose of picking cranberries; and although these rakes tear the vines somewhat, yet the crop is not diminished by raking. On the contrary, it has been increased.

To promote the cultivation of this fruit, the American Institute is making arrangements to supply horticulturists with plants early in the spring.

A Thrilling Incident.

Our noble ship lay at anchor in the Bay of Tangier, a fortified town in the extreme northwest of Africa. The day had been extremely mild, with a gentle breeze sweeping to the northward and westward; but along toward the close of the afternoon, the sea-breeze died away, and one of those sultry, oven-like atmospheric breathings came from the great sun-burnt Sahara. Half an hour before sundown the captain gave the cheering order for the boatswain to call the hands to go in swimming, and in less than five minutes the forms of our tars were seen leaping from the arms of the lower yards.

One of the studding sails had been lowered into the water, with its corners suspended from the main yard-arm and the swinging boom, and into this most of the swimmers made their way. Among those who seemed to be enjoying the sport most heartily, were two of the boys, Tim Wallace and Fred Fairbanks, the latter of whom was the son of our old gunner, and in a laughing mood they started out from the studding sail on a race.

There was a loud, ringing shout of joy on their lips as they put off, and they darted through the water like fishes. The surface of the sea was smooth as glass, though its bosom rose in long, heavy swells that set in from the Atlantic.

The vessel was moored with a long sweep from both cables, and the buoy of the starboard anchor was far away on the starboard quarter, where it rose and fell with the lazy swells like a drunken man.

Towards this buoy the two lads made their way, Fred Fairbanks taking the lead; but when they were within about twenty or thirty fathoms of the buoy, Tim shot ahead and promised to win the race. The old gunner watched the progress of his little son with a vast degree of pride, and when he saw him drop behind, he leaped upon the poop, and was just upon the point of urging him on by a shout, when a cry reached his ear that made him start as if he had been struck with a cannon-ball.

"A shark! a shark!" came forth from the captain of the forecastle, and at the sound of these terrible words the men who were in the water leaped and plunged toward the ship.

Right abeam, at the distance of three or four cables' length, a shark wake was seen in the water, where the back of the monster was visible. His course was for the boys.

For a moment the gunner stood like one bereft of sense, but on the next he shouted at the top of his voice for the boys to turn, but the little fellows heard him not—stoutly the two swimmers strove for the goal, all unconscious of the bloody death-spirit that hovered so near them. Their merry laugh still rang over the waters, and at length they both touched the buoy together.

O, what drops of agony started from the brow of our gunner! A boat had put off, but Fairbanks knew that it could not reach the boys in season, and every moment he expected to see the monster sink from sight—then he knew that all hope would be gone. At this moment a cry reached the ship that went through every heart like a stream of fire—the boys had discovered their enemy.

The cry started old Fairbanks to his senses, and quicker than thought he sprang to the quarter-deck. The guns were all loaded and shotted fore and aft, and none knew their temper better than he. With steady hand, made strong by a sudden hope, the old gunner seized a priming wire and picked the cartridge of one of the quarter guns; then he took from his pocket a percussion wafer, and set it in its place, and set back the hammer of the patent lock. With a giant strength the old man swayed the breech of the heavy gun to its bearing, and then seizing the string of the lock, he stood back and watched for the next swell that would bring the shark in range. He had aimed the piece some distance ahead of his mark, but yet a little moment would settle his hopes and fears. Every breath was hushed, and every heart in that old ship beat painfully. The boat was yet some distance from the boys, while the horrid sea-monster was fearfully near. Suddenly the air was awoke by the roar of the heavy gun, and as the old man knew his shot was gone, he sank back upon the combing of the hatch and covered his face with his hands, as if afraid to see the result of his own efforts, for if he had failed, he knew that his boy was lost.

For a moment after the report of the gun had died away upon the air, there was a dead silence, but as the dense smoke arose from the surface of the water, there was at first a low murmur breaking from the lips of the men; that murmur grew louder and stronger, till it swelled to a joyous, deafening shout. The old gunner sprang to his feet and gazed off on the water, and the first thing that met his view was the huge carcase of the shark, floating with his white belly up, a mangled, lifeless mass.

In a few moments the boat reached the daring swimmers, and half dead with fright they were brought on board. The old man clasped his boy in his arms, and then, overcome by the powerful excitement, he leaned upon a gun for support.

I have see men in all the phases of excitement and suspense, but never have I seen three human beings more overcome by thrilling emotions, than on that startling moment when they first knew the effect of our gunner's shot.

Mr. Court, the noble Mogadore Merchant.

This noble-minded man died in the city of New York about twelve years since. He was for many years a highly prosperous merchant, in connection with his brother in Mogadore, Africa. Their father, who was a London merchant, established these two sons in early life in that city. They often had $100,000 of silver in their house at one time, and generally kept about twenty of the roving Arabs in their employ, whose sole business was to traverse the Arabian deserts, and purchase Christian captives, who might have been thrown ashore, and seized by various tribes as slaves. This is an index to the character of this princely merchant, during his prosperity.

Later in life, adversity came upon him. He left Mogadore and came to reside in New York. In Hudson-stree the rented a three story house; reserved for his own use, being a single man, the two parlors, and rented the remaining portion for enough to pay the rent of the whole. The front parlor, he converted into a shop, where he sold quills, wafers, &c., making in net profits about one shilling a day, on which he lived. The back parlor was his sleeping room, and sitting room, and there he did his own cooking and washing. Living apparently without any desire to trouble the world, or his friends, with his misfortunes, Dr. E. G. Ludlow, one of our benevolent and eminent physicians, attended him for years, as I was assured by Captain Riley, whose name I shall hereafter mention, without any hope or desire of pecuniary reward.

During this period, the merits and strong claims of Mr. Court had become more known, and Dr. Ludlow often proposed to him, to take lodgings at a hotel, or in some situation more congenial with his previous habits of life, offering at the same time, with Mr. Court's permission, to make his case known to benevolent individuals, who would gladly make permanent provision for his support. His reply was, that he could not see how he could be personally benefitted by any change in his mode of living, as his friends now furnished him with books and newspapers. When tired of reading, some child would ring his bell, and wish to buy a penny's worth of wafers, &c., and this served to change the monotony of his daily life. At night his sleep was undisturbed, as he had no property at stake. Stocks might rise or fall—ships might arrive from a good or a bad market. He was only a passenger.

He often remarked, during these discussions, that he thought his severe adversity had given him a new lease of life—and he was not sure that he had been any more happy during his prosperity, than he now found himself in adversity.

This was the man, who, during his residence in Mogadore, had purchased from the Arabs Christians of all nations, brought from the burning sands of Africa into that city, where, unknown, and without a friend to save them from again being at once carried back into permanent slavery, in case they were not redeemed; paying out thousands and tens of thousands of dollars for their redemption—clothing their nakedness—feeding and nursing their famished bodies—restoring their sunken spirits—pouring into their troubled minds the balm of hope of again being restored to their country, to their families and friends; and providing them with a passage at his own expense, and without knowing whether he would ever find his reward on this side of the grave, save in his own noble and generous reflections.

Captain Judah Paddock, of Hudson, N. Y., and Mr. Clarke, his mate, and several of his crew were redeemed by Mr. Court. This gentleman was cast away on the Arabian coast, and seized by a tribe of wild Arabs. By signs, he made them understand that if they would take him and his crew to Mogadore, the American Consul would give them $2,000 for them. The distance was forty days' journey, over burning sands, mostly on foot. The Arabs made Captain Paddock understand, that if the money was not paid, they should all be punished with death for deceiving them. In his printed narrative of his captivity, he describes the cold sweat that stood upon his brow when they came in sight of Mogadore, not expecting to find a person known to him. Naked, the skin burned from his bones, and without hope; with the suspense between restoration to his family, or death, or eternal slavery, worse than death, before him.

His first inquiry was for the American Consul—but there was none. Next for the British Consul, who was poor, but a kind man, with no power to relieve in such cases. But, said the Consul, I will go with you to Mr. Court. To Mr. Court they all went, the Arabs following to see if the money would come. As soon as this interesting party reached Mr. Court's house, he at once embraced the captives as brothers—told them their troubles were over, paid the ransom agreed, and bargained with the same Arabs to go again into the deserts and bring up one more of the crew, who had been taken by another tribe. Under the kindness of Mr. Court, these captives were restored to health and safety, and returned to their homes.

Captain Paddock died before Mr. Court arrived in New York. His widow came down from Hudson, and offered to divide with him all she had. Captain Clarke, who was the mate of Captain Paddock, made every offer in his power to aid Mr. Court—but he was as unwilling to receive in his adversity, as he had been noble and generous in his prosperity.

These old friends he visited, and generally spent his Sabbath evenings with them, where he no doubt received their warmest gratitude. Captain Riley and his crew were also brought into Mogadore, and there redeemed. Mr. Court extended to him every kindness and aid required. In 1839 Mr. Court fell upon the ice, and broke his thigh, which was his last sickness. The facts, here so feebly stated, fully illustrate his noble character, rendering all comment unneccessary.

Coming to the City.

The editor of the N. Y. Tribune, in answer to numerous applications from persons in the country who want to get work in the city, gives the following sensible advice, which we copy for the benefit of all such:—

There seems something akin to madness in the prevalent desire to rush into the City. That idlers and genteel loafers, who don't know how to really work, and wouldn't do it if they knew, should head toward the City, each cofident, like Micawber, that 'something must turn up,' if they can only quarter themselves in New York, is perhaps not surprising; but we have known sober, intelligent, and tolerably industrious men, anxious to bring each his wife and children from the Country to the City, here to pay a city rent and buy food, clothing, and fuel from the salary of a clerk or the weekly earnings of a mechanic! Men who have been accustomed to the luxury of a whole house, however humble, will come here and stow a wife and three children into two rooms and a closet, in the third or fourth story, and there calculate from day to day whether they can afford to have a real dinner, if thereby they may be enabled to live in a city. Of course, they can do this if they will, but it is idle to ask us to help them, after we have so often told them we won't.

'But ought nobody to come to the City?' we are asked. Yes, certainly; there are classes who may properly come; but they are not those who solicit places. Men of remarkable power—Clergymen, Physicians, Teachers, Lecturers, &c.—may come here; but they need not seek places; such men will in due season be sought. Mechanics of the better class—Smiths, Shipwrights, Printers, Masons, Carpenters, Painters, &c.—may often find employment here, and, being virtuous, frugal, and without families, may do well. But let no man of this sort come to a city until he shall have first earned money enough to bring him, support him as long as he means to stay without work, and take him home again; then let him come, look about him, and, finding work, do it, or, not finding it, make his way home again, satisfied that he has 'seen the elephant,' and settle quietly down to his old bench or seat. If he finds work here, let him improve it to the utmost, and when it falls off let him be ready and willing to show the City his heels on the very shortest notice. And each should firmly resolve, if he will stay in a city, to have some property accumulated, or something over a journeyman's wages or clerk's salary to depend upon, before he undertakes the responsibility of providing for a family.

The general rule with regard to City and Country is this—If, through strength of intellect, peculiar faculty, or strength of purpose you are able and willing to do several fair average men's work each day, then the City is the place for, and probably you can do more good or make money faster here than elsewhere; but if you are only able and willing to do one man's work, you can live easier, fare better, and gradually grow into a competence more surely in the Country. The working class work more steadily and faithfully here than in the Country; they live more frugally and save less. They may eat more fresh meat, but they breathe less pure air, while they lodge as industrious people in the Country would not consent to. To one who has a soul, the condition of a City laborer for wages, continually dependent on the favor or caprice of others for the means of subsistence, petitioning for work as a boon, often condemned to idleness, bullied by purse-pride, gronnd down by avarice, and often defrauded of his hard earnings by bankruptcy or knavery, is far from desirable.

Preparing Seed-Corn.

A very good thing we find in the Journal of Agriculture, respecting the preparation of seed corn before it is planted, and it is all the better and more reliable, because it is the result of an experiment—an experiment which, we are confident, many of our readers will try for themselves. Says the correspondent of that Journal:

In October. 1850, I turned over a piece of green sward. In the spring I manured it highly with green manure from the barn-yard, plowed it about the usual depth, and harrowed it thoroughly. I then marked the rows north and south for planting, three and a half feet apart, by drawing a chain.

My seed was steeped six hours in a solution of chloride of lime, and I dropped three in the hill—the hills eighteen inches apart in the rows. In each hill was dropped a small handful of compost, made of plaster, unleached ashes, and hen manure—say two and a half bushels of plaster, three of hen manure, and eight of ashes. The hen manure was taken dry and pulverized, and mixed with the other ingredients in a dry state, and applied in that condition. The corn was covered one inch deep.

The corn came up quickly, and grew with great vigor, and I had an excellent crop, estimated at eighty bushels to the acre.

To determine the value of the chloride of lime and compost applied to the hill, I planted two rows through the middle of the field with the same seed and in the same manure, with the omission of the soaking and compost. The difference was visible at a glance through the season; and on harvesting and weighing the produce on the adjacent rows, I found that the rows planted with dry corn and without the compost, yielded fifty-seven pounds less to the row than the other—making a difference in sixty-four rows—one and a half acres—of 3,648 pounds or fifty-two bushels, or about thirty-five bushels to the acre. I should add, also, that besides the great difference in quantity, the corn from the steeped seed, manured with compost, is worth vastly more than the other, and worth more pound for pound.

Gardening for Girls.

Some of the best writers on education in the country have advocated the importance of this subject, and the peculiarly healthful and strengthening influences that attend it.

Miss Beecher, in her work on Domestic Economy, recommends every father to "set apart a portion of this yard and garden for fruits and flowers, and see that the soil is well prepared and dug over, and all the rest may be committed to the children. These would need to be provided with a light hoe and rake, a dibble or garden trowel, a watering-pot, and means and opportunities for securing seeds, roots, buds, and grafts, all which might be done at a trifling expense. Then, with proper encouragement, and by the aid of such directions as are contained in this work, every man who has even half an acre, could secure a small Eden around his premises."

The writer of a very popular treatise on Gardening says:—"A love of flowers is one of the earliest of our tastes, and certainly one of the most innocent. The cultivation of flowers, while it forms an elegant amusement, is a most healthful and invigorating pursuit. The flower-garden, while it agreeably occupies the time, does not impose a heavy tax on the pocket; and there are very few flowers but what may be cultivated to as great perfection in the garden of the peasant as of the peer. It is a taste, too, which is well adapted to the female character, and affords much rational amusement to the recluse. The cultivator of flowers is not confined to the gratification of beholding the expanded flower, when it spreads forth its glories to the meridian sun; every stage of its growth has been a source of delight, from the moment the seedling peeps above the ground, to the period of its perfect development; and a flower which has been reared by one's hand is viewed with tenfold delight, compared to one, the growth of which has not been witnessed or provided for."

THE GREAT ROUTES OF WESTERN TRAVEL.—The business of three of the great routes of western travel in 1850 and 1851 are as follows:—

	Length.	Cost.	1850. Earnings.	1851.
Erie Canal,	250	$20,768,240	$2,9[illegible],125	$3,001,488
Erie R. R.	327	23,380,000	1,063,950	2,776,919
Central R. R.	462	16,120,230	2,896,042	3,157,696
Total,	1141	$60,268,440	$6,893,117	$8,936,992

This is a remarkable result, showing gross earnings of 15 per cent. on the aggregate cost of the works. Within ten years the increase of traffic upon the leading public works of this country has been immense, no less than $8,410,214. The revenues of the Northern Line, Erie Canal, Pennsylvania Canal, and Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, were $3,924,987, in 1841. The revenues of the same routes of travel, together with the Erie Railroad, were $12,335,001 in 1851. [Eve. Jour.

NAMES OF CONNECTICUT LEGISLATORS.—The New Haven Palladium says: "In the House of Representatives the present session, there are eight Smiths, four Reeds and three of each of the following surnames: Adams, Barnes, Hull, Hyde, Pardee, Phelps, and Wilcox. One town sends two Catlins, another two Smiths, and another two Corbins. Besides these, the names of Cowles, Clark, Day, Foster, Fuller, Hubbard, Olney, Pratt, Robinson, Stone, Thomas, and Wells, have each two Representatives in the lower House. The doublets and triplets, (to say nothing of the octave of Smiths) will be compelled to keep a bright look-out when the ayes and noes are called."

VACANCY FOR A DOCTOR.—Greiner, the Indian Agent in New Mexico, wrote home on the 31st of March, that he knew of an opening for an enterprising physician. A vacancy had happened, and he told how. One of the Eutaws on the San Juan River was taken sick, and an Indian Doctor from the Rio Verde was called in to attend him. Owing to the strength of the disease, or to the weakness of the prescription of the Doctor, the patient died and was buried. After the funeral, the Doctor was taken by the friends of the deceased, tied up, shot and scalped; his wife's hair was cut off; his house burned, containing all his property, and all his animals killed. This is the law among these Indians, regulating doctors. The vacancy is yet unfilled.

CIVILIZATION IN MINNESOTA.—A correspondent of the Albany Register, writing from Minnesota, says:

"It is a singular fact, that the ordinary birds and songsters so common in old settlements, and also the honey bee, unknown here before, have migrated hither, with civilized man. The Indians say that the rattlesnakes follow in his wake also. Be that as it may, while they are numerous further down the Mississippi, they have not yet made their debut into this locality. In the neighborhood of Sauk Rapids, however, some have been killed, where, it is said, they were never seen till recently."

On the 17th ult., says The Wetumpka (Ala.) State Guard, a serious difficulty occurred in the Penitentiary of that State. A convict named Wilson attacked the Sergeant of the Guard, who was about to punish him, and when the overseer of the workshop in which they were interfered, another convict named Hill seized a sledge hammer and felled him to the floor. He was about to strike the overseer again, when a convict named Davis struck him and knocked him down. On recovering from the effect of the blow, he saw the overseer still lying on the floor, and supposing he had killed him, he seized a razor and inflicted a terrible wound in his own throat, from which he afterward died. Mr. Cravens, the overseer, has recovered from the injuries he received.

A frightful accident occurred on the Watertown and Rome Railroad, May 7th. A party of ladies were amusing themselves with a hand-car near Pierrepont, when a freight train came suddenly upon them, running over the hand-car, and instantly killing four of the ladies, mangling them in a shocking manner. Others were also much hurt.

VARIETY.

The Minnesota Pioneer gives an account of a man named John Stean, who was recently found dead on his feet, near St. Paul's. He was an Englishman, between 60 and 70 year of age; had served throughout the Mexican war, and had, last fall, built himself a cabin in the woods, and shut himself up to winter. His neighbors not having seen him for some time, two of them went to his cabin, which they found locked, and on opening it, Stean was discovered standing at the foot of his bed, dead, and frozen solid. He had on seven pair of pantaloons, and in a belt about his waist $270 in gold. He had evidently been dead some weeks.

The famous Ash-House Gallery of paintings and drawings had been sold at auction in London. The pictures brought very high prices, some of which we subjoin. There were 39 pictures offered the first day, including sketches, and the proceeds amounted to £3,456, or about $17,282, being an average of rather more than $443 for each picture. Maclie's noted picture, "Hunt the Slipper," brought 662 guineas; his "Fitting out Moses for the Fair," 400 guineas, and "Moses returning from the Fair," 350 guineas. Collins's "Happy as a King," representing children swinging on a gate, 425 guineas.

Queen Isabella of Spain has given to the image of "Our Lady of Atocha" an imperial crown of fine gold, set with diamonds and Brazilian topazes, the whole worth $750,000; to the image of the Saviour, at the same shrine, a similar crown, though, of course, smaller in size; and two bouquets, of the size of a man's hand, of pure diamonds. For these things, the Queen paid the jeweler Lovia the enormous sum of $1,500,000. The statutes have been adorned with them and placed on an altar where the public can see them; four soldiers constantly keep guard before the shrine.

The Washington Telegraph states that "Mr. De Bibery has invented one of the most important life-saving and swimming apparatuses we have ever seen. Application has been made by Mr. De B. for a patent. It is a kind of frock or doublet, of ordinary dress material, made double, interlaid with small metallic boxes, inflated. This doublet may be worn as an overall on shipboard, and it is impossible for the wearer to sink below the shoulders, and Mr. De B. asserts that a person may remain in the water any length of time, and the water has no effect whatever on the buoyancy of the dress."

A writer in the Boston Traveler calls attention to the fact that on the 19th of April, 1775, the day of the battle of Lexington, the heat was so great as to cause much distress among the British troops on their retreat from Concord; whilst the Spring was so forward, that on the 20th of April the cherry trees were in full blossom, which has not been the case but two or three times since 1775.

To stop the bleeding of the teeth, says the Scientific American, dissolve alum in alchohol; saturate cotton (or lint, which is better) and pack the cavity from which the tooth has been extracted, and the bleeding will cease instantly. The packing may be retained for a day or two without becoming offensive, which is not the case when the alum is dissolved in water.

Two men of Mineral Point, Wis., became intoxicated to a fatal degree a few days since, and died in consequence of it. One drank whiskey all day and went to bed. In the morning he was found dead. The other, after swallowing nearly a quart of raw liquor, lay down by the stove and expired in less than half an hour.

At the sale of Louis Phillippe's library, a romance of chivalry, called "Perceforest," in six volumes, in vellum paper and elegantly bound, was bought for the Duke d'Aumale for $2,210. The rival bidder was an agent of the British Museum. A copy of Josephus, marked by a bayonet-stroke, was also bought by the Duke for $600.

The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term, Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography. Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00

THE PRESS—GOOD AND BAD BOOKS.

It is truly said, that the printing press moves the world. Through its agency the human mind has been roused from that death-like slumber into which the dark ages had plunged it; science has been rapidly disseminated among almost all ranks of society throughout Christendom; and a hundred thousand Bibles have been produced where there was one in former times. We owe much of our civil, intellectual, and religious privileges to the press. The scarcity of books before its invention rendered it almost impossible for any but the rich to possess even a single volume. A single copy of the Bible cost hundreds of dollars, and libraries, which now have their hundred thousand volumes, then could boast of only a few old manuscripts. Princes only could possess libraries, and these were very meagre. But these shackles are now knocked off, and the man who could then possess a hundred, can now have a hundred thousand volumes at a less expense. The Bible, then so dear, can now be had for twenty-five cents. Through the agency of the press, Luther and Melancthon rolled onward the mighty tide of Reformation, of which they were the master-spirits. The press poured out the books of Luther in a flood over Europe, giving them a circulation which could not have been secured had they been subjected to the necessity of being singly copied with the pen. Since its invention the corrupted church of Rome has been gradually losing its ascendency. Its blood-dyed sun has rapidly declined from its zenith, and is now trembling on the horizon of dark oblivion. Its last flickering and baleful rays will ere long be cast upon a world now longing for its exit. A few more blasts from the trump of Jehovah, proclaimed through the press, will hurl it from its usurped throne, and plunge it into the bottomless pit, whence the smoke of its torment will arise, a warning to all impostors who may come after. Such are the triumphs of the printing press; yet they are but preludes to the more glorious triumphs which are hereafter to be achieved by it. Not only Romanism, but Paganism, Mahommedanism, and every ism but truism, are to melt away under the burning light of truth, brought to bear upon them chiefly by its agency.

But while we exult over the final triumph of truth by this means, let us tremble and weep over the devastation brought into our own ranks by this same power in the hands of our enemies. It is a startling fact, that a large portion of the literature of our country is of a decidedly evil nature. Subjects from the vilest catalogues of infernal cogitations, are selected as themes for our writers. These articles, written with pens dipped in the gall of bitterness, and prompted by hearts overflowing with corruption, find but too free access to very many periodicals. A corrupt press is continually pouring out streams of this moral putridity, defiling all with which it comes in contact. It floats about upon the surface of society, like the black and sulphurous scoria that floats upon a stream of lava just disembogued from the bowels of the earth. The moral miasma which arises from it is ten times more deadly than the noxious effluvia that is exhaled from the stagnant waters of the Dead Sea. No purity can inhale it and live. France, the modern Sodom of the old world, having long ago consigned her religion to the tomb of oblivion, has set herself apart for the work of damning souls. Her authors, having received the baptism of sin, have sworn allegiance to the king of the bottomless pit, whom they are likely to serve most faithfully. They devote their time and talents to the production of works which, when finished, might well put the blush upon the vilest demon; and surely, if the angels of heaven could, they would weep over such depravity. This kind of literature finds its way across the Atlantic, and is highly relished by our gormandizers of putrescence. The youth of our land are being corrupted by it. Devastation and moral death prevail wherever it directs its desolating track. What terms of condemnation shall we find for any "satanic pilgrim" who has journeyed to France to "dip from the Dead Sea of her abominations a baptism for our sons and daughters?" Would that he might have been transfixed with a thunder-bolt ere he had accomplished his work.

Let me point out some of the practical results of reading most of what are termed novels of the present day; for almost all of that class must come under the head of pernicious reading. I will not say, however, that novels, or, in other words, ficticious works, may not be rendered highly useful; for I am fully convinced that they can be, and are in very many instances. The chief objections rest against that class of novels called love stories. And yet I would not assume the responsibility of saying that even these may not sometimes be rendered useful; but the cases are so rare, that it would be safer for parents to keep all such books from their children while they are under their control.

One objection to a very large class of novels, and especially love novels, is, that they are overwrought. The writers transcend nature. Their ideals do not, and never can be found to correspond with reality. Some of the evils arising from reading those works I will enumerate.

1. They create a disrelish for real and substantial knowledge, and wed the mind to that which cannot benefit. Any work on science or religion is not relished by a reader of such works, for the simple reason that it is not seasoned with overwrought fiction.

2. They create a dislike for the scenes of active life. No young woman, who is devoted to such reading, can engage in the avocations of the kitchen or spinning wheel with alacrity. Her feelings have been macadamized by the tramp of the ten thousand heroes and heroines which the novelist has caused to pass over them. She can be touched by none other than the imaginary woes and joys of her imaginary heroes and heroines; and no wonder if the dull, monotonous routine of the kitchen, or the heavy buzzing of the wheel, is irksome to her. She lives in an unreal world, and these realities of course cannot be congenial to her. This applies as well to young men as young women.

3. They unfit young people for entering the matrimonial relations. They teach false notions. Ideas entirely vague and unreal are cherished, and anticipations never to be realized are encouraged.

"But what are some of these false notions, vague and unreal ideas, and deceitful anticipations?" says one. Hear them. The heroes and heroines of the novelist are often represented as being angels rather than men; and what follows is, these deceived votaries are quite apt to be looking for angels for partners, and when they think they have found one, they will endeavor to catch him. Angels on earth are not very numerous, and they are sure of being disappointed. Another notion, destructive of happiness, is, that a few weeks acquaintance is sufficient for young people to come to the conclusion to enter upon these solemn responsibilities. Nothing is more unwise or unsafe than a conclusion like this. That knowledge of each other's character requisite to secure happiness to both parties, cannot be obtained by a short acquaintance; and the consequence of overlooking this is, that in nine cases out of ten, hasty unions are worse than none. This notion is taught where the bliss of love at first sight is expatiated upon as being eternal. Still another disastrous notion, taught in too many instances, is, that wedded life is all happiness, no allowance being made for the ills of life. Young people who embrace this delusion, lay up for themselves bitter disappointments. Such things will inevitably sour their dispositions, make them disagreeable to each other, and therefore unhappy. Another objection to these love stories is, that they cultivate a passion, already strong enough, giving it an undue predominance over the other passions and propensities. Any thing which does this must be disastrous, as all metaphysicians agree in teaching.

I will now give my classification of pernicious reading, and show the downward steps in sin which result from indulging in it.

The first class, the evils of which I have already endeavored to show, comprises those tales which, being overwrought, transcend nature, i. e. they are not truthful delineations. Although they inculcate nothing absolutely immoral, yet they corrupt the taste and prepare the way for what is evil. The mind, after it has been fed on this kind for a certain length of time, is prepared for something worse, and the next comes in to meet the want.

The second class comprises that portion of literature which abounds in beautiful figures of speech, a florid style, and is rendered inviting by the nice things offered, but nevertheless conceals the most deadly poison under its specious dress. It is often urged, that the reading of such works cultivates the taste, improves the style, and refines the sensibilities. It is not so, and the very beauties which render them attractive, make them ten times more dangerous. The sting of the envenomed asp is not less fatal for being concealed in the fragrant petals of the rose, nor the bite of the deadly viper less sure of its effects for being hid in a bed of flowers. In such works as these the devil makes his first attacks upon unsuspecting innocence. The arch fiend, too thoroughly versed in wiles, knows full well, that open attacks upon innocence will avail him nothing; for vice, presented to the pure in all its deformities, carries its own cure. Not one in a thousand of those who are now groaning in misery, the victims of criminal indulgence, would have been there could they have seen the poison concealed in their first potion. Before the young can see the good and evil, to judge between them, these books are placed in their hands; and, grasping at what may seem to them to be good, they hug to themselves a hundred deadly vipers, that will some day sting them to death.

The flower of virtue being blighted by reading works of the second class, the way is now prepared for the third step, in which the votaries of pleasure delight to revel in all the unblushing deformities of still another class of evil literature.

In this class are comprised all those works which are openly wicked, skeptical, and vile. O, how many there are who delight swinishly to roll and tumble in the slime and filth of this pool of corruption! It is humiliating. When youth have so far silenced the voice of conscience, and killed the sense of shame, nothing but want of opportunity will prevent them from engaging in any species of vileness.

Parents, you who permit your children to read any and every thing which the devil throws in their way, wonder not that they become infidel in their belief, and vile in their imaginations. It is no matter of wonder. It is but the legitimate effect of a foregoing cause. They have been corrupted by their reading, and you now mourn, but unavailingly, the effect of your too fond indulgence, criminal neglect, or censurable ignorance. If parents would awake to the importance of this subject, and act as rational beings should act, there would be far less crime and misery in our country than there now is. MATHETES.

HAPPY INFLUENCE OF BIBLE READING.

"Charlotte Elizabeth," in her "Personal Recollections," gives the following graphic description of the happy influence of the Bible upon her own mind:—

"A neighbor hearing I was ill," says she, "sent me some books, just received from Dublin, as a loan, hoping I might find some amusement in them. Listlessly, wretchedly, mechanically I opened one—it was the memoir of a departed son, written by his father. I read a page, describing the approach of death, and was arrested by the youth's expressions of self-condemnation, his humble acknowledgment of having deserved at the Lord's hands nothing but eternal death. 'Ah, poor fellow,' said I, 'he was like me. How dreadful his end must have been! I will see what he said at last, when on the very brink of the bottomless pit.' I resumed the book, and found him in continuation glorifying God, that though he was so guilty and so vile, there was one able to save to the uttermost, who had borne his sins, satisfied divine justice for him, opened the gates of heaven, and now waited to receive his ransomed soul.

"The book dropped from my hands. Oh, what is this? This is what I want; this would save me. Who did this for him? Jesus Christ, certainly; and it must be written in the New Testament. I tried to jump up and reach my Bible, but was overpowered by the emotion of my mind. I clasped my hands over my eyes, and then the blessed effects of having even a literal knowledge of Scripture were apparent. Memory brought before me, as the Holy Spirit directed it, not here and there a detached text, but whole chapters, as they had long been committed to its safe, but hitherto unprofitable keeping. The veil was removed from my heart, and Jesus Christ, as the Alpha and Omega, the sum and the substance of every thing, shone out upon me just as He is set forth in the everlasting Gospel. It was the same as if I had been reading, because I knew it so well by rote, only much more rapid, as thought always is. In this there was nothing uncommon; but in the opening of the understanding, that I might UNDERSTAND the Scriptures, was the mighty miracle of grace and truth. There I lay, still as death, my hands still folded over my eyes, and my very soul basking in the pure, calm, holy light that streamed into it through the appointed channel of God's Word. Rapture was not what I felt; excitement, enthusiasm, agitation, there was none. I was like a person long enclosed in a dark dungeon, the walls of which had now fallen down, and I looked round on a sunny landscape of calm and glorious beauty. I well remember that the Lord Jesus, in the character of a shepherd, of a star, and, above all, as the pearl of great price, seemed revealed to me most beautifully; that he could save every body, I at once saw; that he would save me, never even took the form of a question. Those who receive the Gospel by man's preaching, may doubt and cavil; I took it simply from the Bible, in the words that God's wisdom teacheth, and I thus argued:—'Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners; I am a sinner; I want to be saved; he will save me.' There is no presumption in taking God at his word; not to do so is very impertinent; I did it, and I was happy."

LETTER TO AN INVALID.

Dr. Chalmers wrote the following to an invalid sister, in the spring of 1824:—

"I am glad to hear that you are not worse. I hope that you got Clarke's 'Scripture Promises;' but whether you have got the book or not, you have a far nobler privilege in your access to the Bible. I stated that you ought not to fatigue yourself by reading; and, indeed, in as far as the Bible is concerned, I should imagine that when one is sickly and unwell, the best way of reading it would be, here a little and there a little. A single verse, in fact, might, by the power and demonstration of God's Holy Spirit, be made the instrument of comfort to one's spirit for hours together. It is a great matter when the mind dwells on any passage of Scripture, just to think how true it is. This is acting or exercising faith upon it, and the exercise of faith is at all times salutary. For example, think how true it is that God hath set forth Christ as a propitiation for sin, and in the course of so thinking, it may so be that peace shall spring up in the heart—that guilt shall no longer burden the conscience, seeing that an atonement hath been provided for it by God himself—that a sense of reconciliation shall gladden the soul now at rest, because now resting on the sure foundation of God's own Word; and thus it is that a weary and heavy-laden sinner may come to great peace and great joy in believing.

"I know that many read the Bible daily, and have opened and read it many thousand times in their lives, without its producing any such effect. Unless the Spirit of God open our eyes to behold the wondrous things that are contained in the book of God's law, it will remain a sealed book to us. But how comfortable to think that the Spirit is given to those who ask him from God; that he is promised to guide us unto all truth, and to keep all things in our remembrance; and that if we ask we shall receive, if we seek we shall find, if we knock the door shall be opened to us. There is no want, in short, of willingness with God. To find his mercy, all that is needful for us, is to feel our own misery and to cry for relief. He, who giveth the ravens their food, will hear us when we cry; for, be assured, that his ear is ever open to our prayer."

THE CHRISTIAN AND HIS ECHO.

True faith producing love to God and man,
Say, Echo is not this the gospel plan?
The gospel plan.

Must I my faith and love to Jesus show,
By doing good to all, both friend and foe?
Both friend and foe.

But if a brother hates, and treats me ill,
Must I return him good, and love him still?
Love him still.

If he my failings watches to reveal,
Must I his faults as carefully conceal?
As carefully conceal.

But if my name and character he blast,
And cruel malice, too, a long time last;
And if I sorrow and affliction know,
He loves to add unto my cup of wo;
In this uncommon, this peculiar case,
Sweet Echo, say, must I still love and bless?
Still love and bless.

Whatever usage ill I may receive,
Must I be patient still, and still forgive?
Be patient still, and still forgive.

Why, Echo, how is this? thour't sure a dove;
Thy voice shalt teach me nothing else but love.
Nothing else but love.

Amen! with all my heart, then, be it so;
'Tis all delightful, just, and good I know;
And now to practice I'll directly go.
Directly go.

Things being so, whoever me reject,
My gracious God me surely will protect.
Surely will protect.

Henceforth I'll roll in him my every care,
And then both friend and foe embrace in prayer.
Embrace in prayer.

But after all those duties I have done,
Must I in point of merit them disown,
And trust for heaven through Jesus' blood alone?
Through Jesus' blood alone.

Echo, enough! thy counsels to mine ear
Are sweeter than to flowers the dew-drop tear;
Thy wise, instructive lessons please me well;
I'll go and practice them. Farewell, farewell.
Practice them. Farewell, farewell.

THE BOOK OF THE DAY.

From the Christian Watchman and Reflector.

UNCLE TOM'S CABIN; or, Life among the Lowly. By Harriet Beecher Stowe. Boston: John P. Jewett & Co.

"Is this book true?"—said a child to us, turning his eye for one moment from its fascinating pages. We suppose the answer to this question to be just that which Mrs. Stowe has herself given. It weaves into the form of a narrative actual illustrations of slavery. It presents its best aspects and its worst, and all its intermediate forms, from actual cases, shifting scenes and characters so as to make a continuous story. It awakens no uncalled for sympathy on the part of the reader; no indignation which the atrocities of the system of slavery do not justify and demand. The dark and dreadful possibilities of the system, are often its actualities. They may not all come under the observation of every individual, but it is of no use on that account to deny them as true. The area is a wide one over which the system is spread, and here is one form, there is another, and far away is another still, the terrible evils which are possible under it, are continually becoming actual. Scenes like those which Mrs. Stowe has described belong to its very nature, and are as certain to spring from it as are any other results to come forth from adequate causes. Stripped of the circumstances which strike the imagination, what are some of the facts here stated?

On an estate in Kentucky, where slavery prevails in its mildest form, is a company of slaves under an excellent master and mistress. The mistress is a model of a Christian woman, and the master, though not himself a Christian, is kind and generous, and greatly under the influence of his excellent wife. Contentment and happiness abide under their own roof, and in all the slave cabins around them. For them, or for their son, a noble lad, their servants would lay down their lives. Slavery is seldom seen under more conciliating and even winning forms, than on this estate. The advocates of slavery would hardly draw a fairer picture to illustrate the beauties of the system.

But the master is embarrassed in his affairs, and in spite of him, is at the mercy of a trader in the bodies and souls of men. The estate can be freed from its incumbrances only by the sale of two slaves, one of whom is Uncle Tom, the honored father of several children, and the husband of a faithful wife, the trustiest and best of servants, and the model, in his humble sphere, of a godly Christian man. The other is a fine boy, four or five years old, the child of quadroon parents, nearly white, the mother a favorite servant, constantly attending her mistress, and beloved by her almost as a child—the father a young man of remarkable intelligence, belonging on another estate, the property of a heartless wretch, who is jealous of his intellectual superiority, and dooms him to incessant torments.

The sale is consummated while the good mistress knows it not, and in the dreadful business of communicating it to her, and endeavoring to reconcile her to it, the master is overheard by Eliza, the quadroon mother. Not long is she in fixing her determination. At midnight, with her boy in her arms, she goes forth from her chamber, and pausing at the cabin of Uncle Tom, to make known to him his own fate, she turns her back forever on her home, and pursues her anxious way towards Canada. A slave run away from that estate is a marvel indeed; the trader, when he comes for "his own," overflows with rage, and two servants are permitted to go with him in the pursuit. They are satisfied that "missis" does not wish them successful, and by igenious artifices they delay the start, and perplex the pursuit, and the panting fugitive escapes. Her husband, too, flies from bondage, joins her in Ohio, and they reach Canada in safety.

Uncle Tom will not fly. He trusts in the Lord, who doeth all things well. His mistress promises him that at the earliest possible period he shall be redeemed, and young "mas'r George," who is absent when the sale occurs, and heart-broken and indignant when he hears of it, renews and confirms the pledge. Tender is the farewell of the true and faithful servant, husband, and father, as he leaves to go "down the river"—that horror to the slaves of Kentucky. The journey down the river furnishes divers illustrations of the horrible traffic in slaves. Tom is sold before reaching New Orleans, and falls into the hands of an honorable and indulgent master, whose confidence and regard he is not long in winning. In this family Tom's religious instructions and influence guide to the way of life a little girl, the only and beloved child, of Tom's master and mistress. The sweet little creature died, but not till she had her father's solemn promise that Tom should be sent back to his family, free. The master communicated his purpose to Tom, and informed him that the necessary papers were in actual preparation. But suddenly the master is killed; the mistress, a selfish, indolent, and heartless woman, is indifferent alike to the promise of her husband to the buried child, and to that which he had given to the slave; she sends Tom and all the rest to the auction rooms. On the very eve of freedom, Tom drinks anew and deeper than ever the cup of slavery. He has already been sold to pay a master's debts; now he is a victim to a habit of inefficiency and delay on the part of his new master, which had fatally postponed the execution of free papers, and is doomed to taste the tender mercies of heirs and executors.

What was before him now? The next purchaser was a monster of a man, who had a plantation on the Red River. At this plantation we have a picture of slavery in its most terrible forms. Here Tom's very religion becomes a crime, and the faithful servant, beaten and bruised, breathes away his life, a martyr. His young "mas'r George" arrives just in time to receive his dying breath, and with his own hands to lay in the grave the old man, whom he had diligently sought, and whom he had come all this way to ransom.

These are the leading facts; and they are all the possibilities and the actualities of the system of slavery. It is impossible, with any show of truth, to deny the justness of these pictures. Good and faithful slaves are sold by embarrassed masters; good masters die with purposes of emancipation unexecuted; heirs and executors do break up the establishments of deceased masters, and send the slaves to the public auctions. Here any body may buy that pleases, and no matter how few may be the proportion of masters that are monsters, there are such, and these have full liberty, with the good, to buy. They do buy, and the dreadful scenes of the Red River plantation answer to known facts. The pictures of Mrs. Stowe involve, as they ought, the bright side and the dark side of slavery. And herein is the fairness of the book. It embraces no wholesale and indiscriminate denunciations. It asserts no faultless virtue on the part of the free States; it admits the existence of oppression where slavery does not prevail. It rests man's claims to freedom on grounds which commend themselves to an enlightened reason and conscience, and enforces the claims with an urgency which we believe it is impossible to resist. The religious spirit which pervades the book is admirable. We rejoice in its appearance; we thank God that it goes forth by tens of thousands to its mission. In three months hundreds of thousands of persons will have read it, and it needs no vision of prophecy to foresee that its influences will be vast and immeasurable in deepening the antagonism to slavery, and hastening the day of its doom.

CHRISTIANITY AND CANNIBALS.

In the following recent occurrence, we have a beautiful instance of the effects of Missions in providing from amongst cannibals a safe and kindly asylum for shipwrecked mariners. The ship "Lady Howden" sailed from California for Sydney on 7th of April, 1850, and on the 22d of May was wrecked on a coral reef near Onega, one of the Fejee Islands. The men took to their boats, and pulled toward the shore, a distance of seven miles. After getting so near as to see the natives on the land, they lay for a while on their oars, discussing whether to steer for the Isle of Pines, 900 miles distant, or to go ashore and stand the chance of being devoured by cannibals. The latter course was adopted. "We hoisted our ensign," says Mr. Plumptre, one of the passengers, an Irish Roman Catholic, "and gave it a cheer, upon which the natives launched a canoe and came off, giving us a hearty shake of hands. We were astonished. The natives soon got hold of the boats and drew them ashore. We were met by several natives, who conducted us to a hut, where an ample supper of yams and cocoa-nut cakes were provided. Before retiring, they had prayers in their native language; and as they sang their evening hymn, I felt a calm devotion, to which, I regret to say, I had long been a stranger. I need not say that I was agreeably surprised to find that, instead of being among cannibals, I was among devout Wesleyan Methodists, brought to the knowledge of the truth by the Wesleyan missionaries. What gratitude I felt for those brave soldiers of the cross, who came into these distant lands to teach the will of God to this benighted people!" [Lawry.

THE POWER OF PRAYER.

"If two of you shall agree on earth as touching any thing that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven." Matt. 18: 19.

Every instance of successful prayer, is an enouragement to the pious heart, and deserves to be put on record for the common benefit of the Christian church.

In a precious work of grace, with which it has just pleased the Lord to visit one of his churches in N., a signal instance of this nature has occurred. Three months ago, the session met, preparatory to the communion, but there was not a single applicant for admission to the ordinance. They were greatly cut down and mortified, especially as they had looked for one or two additions. In this situation, the pastor proposed, as they had no other business before them, to turn it into a prayer-meeting. Accordingly each was called to pray in turn, and the pastor made a few remarks. Said he, "It has of late been very solemnly borne upon my mind, that I have children of an age to come forward, who evince no disposition to do so. And it is the same case with each of you. You, Mr. ——, have children who are holding back, and you, Mr. ——, and you, Mr. ——, and you also, Mr. ——." "Yes," they all acknowledged, and lamented the sad truth. They then agreed that they would pray for each other's children, and for the children of the congregation, when they prayed for their own; and so parted. Before a month had expired, a case of decided concern appeared in the family of one of the elders; next, a like case in the family of the pastor; then, among the children of another elder. Thence an interest extended through the congregation. Meetings were of necessity multiplied, such was the general thirst for information how to be saved. Upwards of thirty persons were brought under deep exercise of mind.

Of these, sixteen were received into the communion of the church, and of the rest, several are now in a hopeful state. One young man, a student, was awakened on the day of prayer for colleges.

The families of the pastor and elders are five in number. Three out of the five have obtained a blessing; six members in all, (two out of each family,) having decided to come on the Lord's side. One of the individuals alluded to, was absent from home all the time, and of course not directly approachable; and all were ignorant that prayer was continually made for them.

This appears to be so marked an answer to prayer, (Isa. 65: 24,) that it is now put on record to encourage God's people every where to pray, and not faint. [N. Y. Observer.

BE STILL.

It is often easier to do than to suffer the will of God. There is a pleasurable excitement in the employment of one's active powers in the service of Christ, a satisfaction in the consciousness of doing good. A little grace, with favoring Providence, may make a Christian hero; while abounding grace alone will suffice to make a Christian martyr.

Be still when persecuted or slandered. If unjustly accused, you may regard every epithet of abuse as a badge of discipleship. Your divine Master and his apostles and witnesses were marked in the same way. Then, too, every lie has the seeds of death within it. Let it alone, it will die of itself. Opposition may look very formidable; it may seem as "though the mountains were carried into the midst of the sea; the waters thereof roar, and be troubled; the mountains shake with the swelling thereof;" but the voice of wisdom cries, "Be still, and know that I am God."

Be still when thwarted in your plans and disappointed in your hopes. You are not responsible for results. If you have sought trustworthy ends by lawful means, and have done your utmost to attain them, the issue is of Divine ordering, and should be no more the subject of murmuring or repining than the changes of the seasons or the rolling of the spheres. The purpose of God in your loss or disappointment may not be obvious. You may have to content yourself with the thought —"These are but parts of his ways." But the fact that they are his ways, must hush the soul in quietude under the most trying and mysterious crosses of life. Faith will take Cowper's song:

"Behind a frowning providence
He hides a smiling face."

Be still under sore afflictions. They are all deserved. They are all ordered of God. They are embraced among the "all things" that shall work together for good to them who love God. Murmuring does not lessen, but rather increases the burden of griefs. Submitted to—acquiesced in—sanctified—every sorrow may distil new joys; every affliction may work out "a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." Many a saint has never experienced the infinite preciousness of the gospel, until the rod of God is upon him. It is when in the vale, with eyes uplifted and the mouth closed—"I was dumb"—that the stars of promise glisten on the spiritual vision, and the Sun of Righteousness darts his rays of comfort and holy joy on the stricken soul. [Heber.

YOUNG PROFESSORS.

The following incident will show the importance of Christian decision. A young lady having recently made a public profession of her faith in Christ, was urged by her brother, whom she tenderly loved, to accompany him to a place of amusement, which many church members were in the habit of attending. But she resisted his importunities, and he went alone. On his return, he said to another member of the family, "I did not enjoy myself as I had anticipated; and I respect religion the more from its exhibition in the conduct of my sister, whom I could not divert from what she believed to be right. Had she gone with me, I should have been confirmed in the opinion that religion was more a pretence than a reality. Her consistency of character with her profession has rendered her nearer to me than ever."

This may prove a useful lesson not only to young professors, but to all such as are making religion a subject of serious inquiry.

I DID NOT GIVE ENOUGH FOR MY BIBLE.—A Bible distributer in Germany called upon a blacksmith and urged him to buy a Bible. Being ignorant of the value of the precious volume, he refused to part with his money to obtain it. It was then offered to him gratuitously, but he disdained to receive it upon such terms. A compromise was at length effected by his agreeing to give a fire-shovel for the book. After the labors of the day were over, curiosity prompted him to look into the book which he had purchased; and as he read, his heart was opened, and the character of God was revealed to him. The depravity of his nature; the worth of his soul; his need of a Saviour; the preciousness of Christ, were deeply felt; he was melted to tears; and as he wiped from his cheek the falling drops, he said to himself, "I did not give enough for my Bible!" Early in the morning he went into his shop, finished a pair of tongs, went in search of the Bible distributer, and, finding him, said, "My dear sir, please accept a pair of tongs with the shovel, I did not give enough for my Bible."

RELATION OF MINISTERS TO CHURCHES.

We have just returned from a pleasant, and (we trust) profitable anniversary of the Eastern Association, a report of whose proceedings will be found in another column. Among the things done, was a resolution declaring the judgment of the body, that it is a violation of gospel order for a church to recognize as its pastor or stated minister a person who does not become amenable to its discipline by connecting himself with it as one of its members. We hope this resolution will receive attention; not because it is the expression of the Association's judgment, but because it sets forth the doctrine of the New Testament. Epaphras, who was Pastor of the church at Colosse, (Col. 1: 7,) was one of its members, (see chap. 4: 12;) and not an instance is recorded of one exercising the office of Pastor, or Bishop, in a church to which he did not belong. Seventh-day Baptist churches claim to be conformed to the New Testament model; yet, in some instances, they have been so remiss as to allow ministers to come from distant congregations, exercise the pastoral office for months and years, and depart again, without having come under their jurisdiction at all. Such churches, as one of the speakers upon the resolution very properly remarked, ought to pass a vote, at every communion season, inviting their pastors to participate in the ordinance, according to the usual custom of inviting all members of sister churches, in good standing, who happen to be present.

This evil is not owing (we think) to any denominational predilection for prelacy, or that form of church government which makes ministers independent of the churches, but rather to a neglect, of late years, to inquire for the old paths, and to study the apostolical teachings. There is no lack of the democratic spirit among us, as every one will see who witnesses our deliberations; but there is danger lest we forget that the democracy of the New Testament consists in a rigid compliance with inspired order. If we allow our own notions of expediency to infringe upon this order, in ever so small a degree, we shall bring ourselves into bondage, notwithstanding we may promise to ourselves liberty. Democracy, it is true, acknowledges no visible Head—no universal Bishop—no central tribunal, in which all the churches together have an embodied unity; but if it be pure New Testament democracy, it does acknowledge a universal Bishop in the Lord Jesus Christ, who, by his inspired Apostles, prescribes an order, a faithful adherence to which, on the part of the churches, is the security of their independence.

A few—we trust they are very few—seem to have got the notion, that a minister's ecclesiastical relation is to the Association, or the Conference, or some such body; and that to such body he is amenable for his conduct, and not to any particular church. But what countenance does this notion receive from the Word of God? We scruple not to say, that it receives none. An Association has been called, peradventure, to aid in the minister's ordination. Its judgment of the candidate's fitness for the office has been obtained, and its ministers have officiated in setting him apart to the work. But it is a great error to suppose that his ordination was the gift of the Association, or that the Association has power to take it away after it has been conferred. His ordination originated with the church to which he belonged, was the gift of the church, and by the church to which he belongs it can be taken away. The Association was a mere advisory council, whose judgment in the case the church was at liberty to seek, or not, as it saw best. The Association's Presbytery (collection of ministers) was a mere agency, which the church employed to perform the customary formalities of designating the candidate to his work; an agency which the church was under no obligation to employ, but might have availed itself of any other. The Association, therefore, had no power in the matter, except what was given to it for the time by the church which asked its advice. It was but the servant of the church; and should it afterwards assume to exercise the power of deposing from the ministry one whom it had ordained, under the hallucination that the ordination had been its own free gift, it would exhibit an arrogance for which it would deserve the severest rebuke. The same may be said of a Conference, or any other associated body.

For our own part, we are rather prejudiced against the practice of resorting to such an agency, for the ordination of ministers, as an Association or General Conference. We much prefer the simple plan of selecting a council specially for the purpose; not that we suppose the latter course to be any more scriptural than the former, but because a special council, being immediately dissolved after the ceremony is over, there is no room left for the supposition that the ordination is any thing else but the gift of the church. But an Association or Conference, having a standing existence, and meeting from year to year, the idea is very apt to obtain, that it is a body which has original jurisdiction in such things. Indeed, the Association or Conference itself becomes intoxicated with such a notion, after a time, and can hardly manage its proceedings without once in a while behaving somewhat unseemly.

T. B. B.

THE EASTERN ASSOCIATION.

The Seventh-day Baptist Eastern Association held its Sixteenth Annual Meeting at Waterford, Ct. It commenced on Fifth-day, May 20th, and the regular business was completed in the afternoon of Sixth-day, although meetings for preaching continued until the afternoon of First-day. The delegation in attendance was rather smaller than usual from West New Jersey and Rensselaer Co., N. Y.; but from East New Jersey, New York, and Rhode Island, it was quite large. James Bailey was present as a delegate from the Western Association, and W. C. Whitford as a delegate from the Central Association. David Dunn, of New Market, N. J., served as Moderator, and H. H. Baker and E. P. Larkin as Secretaries. The discussions, both upon points arising in connection with the business, and upon the resolutions introduced, were of a nature to excite considerable feeling, but, we are happy to say, they were free from acrimony. Only one expression have we heard in relation to the general character of the session, and that is that it was an interesting and pleasant one.

Without attempting to follow the order in which the business was transacted, we will give some account of the leading items.

Introductory Discourse.

Agreeable to appointment, the Introductory Discourse was preached by James H. Cochran, of Plainfield, N. J. He took for his text Psalm 137 : 5, 6—"If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning. If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy." By way of introduction, the church of Jesus Christ was spoken of as sustaining a relation to the believer similar in many respects to that which Jerusalem sustained to the writer of this Psalm; and it was maintained, that every Christian ought to feel such an interest for the church as the Psalmist says he felt for Jerusalem. The first leading point considered by the preacher was the duty devolving upon those who profess to be Christians of living in union with the church—the representative of Christ on earth; and under this head the various objections or apologies for neglecting this duty were examined and shown to be unsatisfactory. The second point was the duty of denying self in order to promote the interests of the church. Third, the evidence of one's being identified in feeling with the church. Fourth, reasons why the Christian should love the church—it is the place of his birth, the abode of his best friends, and the object of the Saviour's love.

State of the Churches.

The Letters from the Churches indicate that they are nearly all supplied with the regular ministration of the Word, and that the attendance upon it is satisfactory. In several of the Churches—as 2d Hopkinton, Rockville, and Waterford—revivals have been enjoyed within the past year. In nearly all, we think, there is a growing interest in our benevolent operations, and in the subject of Sabbath Schools and Bible Classes. But in most of the churches there is evidently a lack of that zeal in the cause of Christ, that regularity and earnestness in cultivating family religion, and that consistency in conforming practice to preaching in regard to the Sabbath, which ought to characterize us. Some of the letters express this, and also regret on account of it. But the general feeling indicated by the letters and the remarks of the delegates, was, that a deepening of this regret is necessary to the revival and enlargement of the churches. During the year, there were added to the churches 82, dismissed 35, deceased 41, rejected 17.

Associational Missions.

The Executive Board to direct missionary labors among the feeble churches and societies within the bounds of the Association, have done but little during the past year. They were not able to find a person to devote his whole time to preaching among the scattered Sabbath-keepers in Rhode Island and other parts of New England, as directed at the last meeting of the Association. They however obtained the labors of Eld. Henry Clarke for a portion of the time at South Kingston. For the coming year, they were instructed to continue to aid the church at South Kingston, and to make farther efforts "to obtain a missionary to labor within the bounds of the Association, for the promotion of pure and undefiled religion, the advancement of the Sabbath cause, and the salvation of souls."

Resolutions.

A series of resolutions, introduced by the Business Committee, occupied the attention of the Association during the afternoon of Sixth-day. They were not intended to furnish themes for set speeches, but to bring to the attention of the body subjects of vital importance, and secure a general expression of opinion and feeling upon them. We print below the resolutions which were adopted. That relating to the church membership of ministers, was spoken upon by several individuals, and is intended to correct a very serious evil, arising, no doubt, in many cases, from a want of consideration alone. The resolution upon the manner of keeping the Sabbath, drew forth remarks from a large number of persons, which indicated a good deal of feeling upon the subject, and will not soon be forgotten by those who heard them. The resolutions upon slavery—especially that touching the Fugitive Slave Law—gave the audience, an opportunity to learn whether "the higher law" is generally respected by the members of this Association. The conclusion to which the discussion upon that topic led us, was, that the law has done more to create and deepen anti-slavery feeling, than all the resolutions passed by abolitionists in the last ten years. Following the resolution on Temperance was one dissuading from the use of Tobacco, as a species of intemperance; it was discussed with considerable animation, pro and con, but was finally laid on the table. A resolution recommending a day of fasting and prayer, was also considered, but laid on the table, under the impression that it is desirable to have such a recommendation originate with the General Conference or one of the denominational Societies, so as to have all unite in observing such a day.

1. Resolved, That, in the judgment of this Association, a church which recognizes as its Pastor or Elder one who is not one of its members, does not comply with gospel order.

2. Resolved, That the members of this Association view with pain the inconsistency of those who, professing to keep the Sabbath of the Bible, fail to devote the hours of that sacred day to strictly religious purposes; and they would urge upon all such the necessity, in order to enjoy the blessing connected with keeping the Sabbath, of complying fully with that passage of Scripture, "If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day; and call the Sabbath a Delight, the Holy of the Lord, Honorable; and shalt honor him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words; then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord; and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."

3. Believing it to be the duty of the church to bear testimony against sin wherever found, whether in individuals or collective bodies; and believing that slavery, as it exists in our country, involves the most flagrant sins, and almost a total subversion of Christian principle; therefore—

Resolved, (1.) That we enter our solemn protest against the system of American slavery, as a sin against God, and a libel upon our national declaration that "all men are created equal."

Resolved, (2.) That we regard the Fugitive Slave Law as an atrocious violation of the rights of humanity and the principles of the Gospel—the enforcement of which actually prohibits the discharge of duties which are obligatory on every Christian; and that to aid in its execution would be treason to Jesus Christ.

Resolved, (3.) That, as an association of Christian churches, we disclaim all fellowship with slavery or its abettors.

4. Resolved, That the use of intoxicating drinks as a beverage is hurtful to the physical and moral constitution of men, and therefore sinful; and that this Association affectionately and earnestly advises all persons, especially those connected with our churches, to abstain from their use, manufacture, or sale.

5. Resolved, That we cordially approve of the efforts of the Seventh-day Baptist Publishing Society to disseminate the truths of the Bible, and general intelligence connected with the welfare of the Seventh-day Baptist denomination, by the publication of the Sabbath Recorder, the Sabbath-School Visitor, and the Seventh-day Baptist Memorial; and therefore recommend their liberal patronage.

6. Resolved, That in the opinion of this Association, the Sabbath commences at the going down of the sun on the evening previous to the morning of the seventh day of the week.

7. Resolved, That we recommend an increase of effort among us for the support of our missionary operations and the spread of the Gospel at home and abroad.

8. Resolved, That we recommend the daily worship of God in all the families connected with this Association.

Religious Exercises.

On Sabbath evening, Charles M. Lewis delivered a discourse, his subject being the faith of Noah. Sabbath morning, a discourse was preached by Thomas B. Brown, on the difficulties of the missionary work, followed by a collection in behalf of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society. In the afternoon, a discourse by W. B. Gillett, after which the Lord's Supper was administered. In the evening, David Clawson preached. First-day morning, a discourse by James Bailey, and in the afternoon by James H. Cochran.

Miscellaneous Items.

The Corresponding Secretary for the ensuing year is Sherman S. Griswold, of Mystic Bridge, Conn. Treasurer, Asher M. Babcock, Westerly, R. I.

Alfred B. Burdick was appointed to attend the next meeting of the Central Association, and James H. Cochran that of the Western Association.

David Dunn, W. B. Gillett and J. H. Cochran were appointed a Committee to arrange business and religious exercises for the next session of the Association.

Charles M. Lewis was appointed to preach the opening discourse at the next meeting of the Association; Daniel Coon, alternate.

Adjourned to meet with the Church in Piscataway, N. J., on the fifth day of the week before the last Sabbath in May, 1853.

BRITISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Illustrations of Sunday-keeping—Religious Institutions—Rev. Mr. Gladstone—Crystal Palace.

GLASGOW, May 7th, 1852.

In Paris, on Sunday, 25th ult., the French President reviewed the military, and "was extremely well received by the people." Another announcement intimates that he slept at the Tuilleries" "in order that he might be at hand for the review of Sunday"—implying a deep interest in this sort of Sunday sanctification. In the British House of Commons, on the following day, Mr. Cowan (a Free Churchman) one of the Members of Parliament for Edinburgh, presented Petitions from Scotland against Sunday labor in the Post Offices—without their eliciting any remark from any other Member.

Several of the Annual Meetings of the Religious Institutions have been held in London this week and last. On the 27th ult., at the Baptist Missionary Society, it appeared from the Report, that the Receipts for the year were £19,116, and the Expenditure £18,088. And on the 30th ult. the Hanserd Knollys Society, for the republication of old Baptist books, had their annual meeting, when our brother, the Rev. W. H. Black, took part in the proceedings. The Report spoke discouragingly of the support rendered—the subscriptions and receipts having been falling off in successive years. They had at an early period 1,100 subscribers; the present number is 750. The Receipts for the year were £217; the Expenditures, £200. They print 1500 copies usually of the books issued, but of the later volumes a considerable number of copies are on hand.

The Rev. Mr. Gladstone's case, (to which I formerly alluded,) has been heard in the Arches Court. He is charged with publicly reading Prayers in an unconsecrated chapel (in which he has been accustomed to minister) in London, without the license of the Bishop, and contrary to his monition and prohibition. Mr. G. alledged in Court, that there is "at this moment a deep-laid conspiracy" against the supremacy of the Queen. Having been interrupted as making remarks irrelevant to the question, he said that if denied liberty to deal with the question as he wished, he should appeal to Her Majesty in Council—which he afterwards did, on his defense being rejected. His principal allegation, responsive to the libel, was that the Bishop's monition was not a godly but ungodly one; and his ordination vows bound him to obey only godly monitions. He believed that his real fault was, that he had kept them too faithfully. His appeal to the Queen, the Judge declined to allow; but Mr. G. is given till next session to state whether he has exceptions to the testimony of the opposing witnesses. It is stated that he will defend himself to the last extremity; and we trust that good may result, in showing to faithful ministers and members of the Church of England what is the danger of promising implicit obedience to human authority, and what the true character of some of their dignitaries is. This same Bishop of London has interdicted the Rev. Mr. Nolan from speaking, much less preaching, at any of the London May assemblies, for any Institution not connected with the Church of England. It is therefore little to be wondered at, that when the Rev. Mr. Duffield, the Rector of Bow, asked Mr. Gladstone (who is his personal friend) to preach in his church at Easter, the Bishop immediately forbade it, under the penalty of being himself inhibited. And this, when all sorts of Protestant Popery finds favor in his eyes, or is passed over as requiring no notice.

The Crystal Palace is now finally determined to be removed, and has been purchased by private parties for £70,000, to be re-erected in some form on a different site. Numerous meetings were held and petitions presented to Parliament; but, having been expressly stipulated to be only temporary in its first position, it was regarded as a breach of faith to propose to retain it there.

QUALIFICATIONS FOR THE MINISTRY.

> "Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." Matt. 28: 19, 20.
>
> "Apt to teach." 1 Timothy 3: 2
>
> "Not a novice, lest, being lifted up with pride, he fall into the condemnation of the devil." 1 Timothy 3: 6.

I have selected a few passages touching the qualifications of ministers, as given by Jesus Christ, and by the great Apostle Paul, as a starting point to some thoughts I wish to offer, as expressive of my own views, and possibly for the benefit of some others.

Jesus Christ selected and appointed as the ministers of his gospel, such as had the ability to teach. The mission that the gospel has in the world is such, that the most skillful teachers are necessary to carry out that mission. The mass of the world are ignorant, superstitious, and wedded to error. Before the gospel of Christ can accomplish its great work, this ignorance must be removed, the superstition dissipated, and the error combatted and overcome. Irreligion seeks the covert of science, and the aid of subtle sophistry, to drive back the approaches of the gospel, and hides itself in forced interpretations of Scripture, and claims and feels a complacent security in the refuges it has created. The Saviour, understanding how infidelity would gird itself for the conflict, directed his disciples to go and teach. This was their great work. To teach, to instruct, to enlighten, to convince, were the great things needed to prepare the world to believe and be saved. Men must be taught what to believe, and how to believe, before they can be persuaded to believe. The whole system of religion must be laid open, so that it can be seen. It must be presented by arguments that will convince, and by eloquence that will persuade. Well did an Apostle, who was skilled in the wisdom of the age, and whose burning eloquence made the ruler tremble, exclaim, "Who is sufficient for these things?" Ignorance can be conquered only by intelligence. The Saviour, therefore, sent forth teachers, and none but teachers.

The Apostle who labored more abundantly than the others, and who met men of high and low degree, said of the ministers of the gospel, that they must be "apt to teach." Who could know, better than he, what were requisites to success in the ministry? An easy ability to instruct, a readiness to teach, was to him an indispensable preparation to preach the gospel. A novice would not fill the place of a teacher. The real, and not the imagined, ability to instruct, must be possessed because, in matters of the soul, there must be no ignorance, and no delusion, or all is endangered. Blind guides, blind leaders of the blind, were denounced by the Saviour. The Saviour and his apostles would not admit one to the ministry that was not qualified to teach, and to give an intelligent exposition of the whole economy of the gospel. Other qualifications were necessary, but they could not supersede this. We know of no qualifications for the sacred office but such as are set before us by Christ and his Apostle; nor, where these are wanting, can one be safely entrusted with the holy office.

If the above statements are allowed, councils must be sustained in abiding by them, whenever called upon by churches or individuals to examine any one with a view of consecrating him to the great work of preaching Christ. Every other qualification given by the Apostle is as suitable for a layman as a clergyman; and they who possess them can labor as efficiently out of the ministry as in it, if they have no "aptness to teach." And why should the ministerial office be burdened and dishonored by inducting into it good men who can not teach? Zeal, and piety, and industry, and faithfulness, as well become a private as a public member of the church. Overlooking this fact, many good men have been spoiled by ordaining them, and the holy office has been degraded and dishonored. And O, how has the word of God been handled by unskillful hands!

A brother is presented to a council for ordination. It is said of him, that he is pious, zealous, and useful, and that many have been converted under his labors. On inquiry, it is ascertained that his preaching is not well received—that he is incapable of giving an exegetical discourse—that instead of instructing his congregation, they are generally uninterested, and none enlightened. In such a case, what shall be done? If he is set aside, there is an uproar because one so pious, so zealous, so useful, is restrained by the council; and invidious comparisons are made between him and members of the council. If he is ordained, a minister is thrown upon the church and into the world who is incapable of complying with the great commission, "Go and teach!" The handling of the word of life is brought into disrepute, and those who sit under his ministry are religious pigmies, or are intelligent Christians in spite of his ministrations. The custom has been to induct such an one into the ministry; and wo betide the minister that dare make an innovation on the long-established custom. Because a man has zeal and piety, and can talk an hour before a congregation, and wax warm in the talk, is he therefore to be ordained? Under my incog., I aver, No. His zeal and piety could shine brighter in another sphere. And if he has been instrumental in the conversion of souls, it has been because of his private and not public labors. Zeal and piety and eminent success beautifully adorn the private Christian. Let all who are thus honored abide in it, and not, by an effort to take a higher station, lose their good name and good influence.

It is often urged, as an argument for taking holy orders, that the Holy Ghost has called such to the work. The Holy Ghost never calls those to preach who can not preach. It never sets a novice to preaching. Therefore, let such judge that they are mistaken, and seek to honor God in a humbler sphere. Would it not be better for the churches to be without ministers, than have for ministers those who can not comply with the command, "Go teach?" Better, far, had the churches join in the request—

"From such Apostles, O ye mitred heads,
Preserve the church! and lay not careless hands
On skulls that can not teach, and will not learn."

A MINISTER.

INDIAN CORN IN PALESTINE.

PHILADELPHIA, May 11, 1852.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

In the haste of copying off our friend's "Report from Palestine," the following fact was overlooked, which may, we trust, be interesting to your readers, as it illustrates the helping hand of Providence in introducing productions hitherto unknown in that once glorious land:—

"The ear of Indian corn brought with us in our first visit (in 1849) has increased a thousand fold, so that Meshullam gave away to many poor Jews a large quantity of green-corn last year, has sold much, has eaten of it freely all the past winter season in his family, and has plenty yet."

Its history I will briefly narrate: One of the travelers in 1849 felt a strong impression to take a beautiful twelve-rowed ear of Indian corn, that was presented to him by a friend from the country; and he put into his trunk, intending to drop some of its grains in some opportune spot. When they arrived at Meshullam's hotel in Jerusalem, and after he had told them of his efforts in agriculture, and found that the friends were Americans, he said, one day: "In 1825, I traveled in the United States, and visited Philadelphia in the summer; and at dinner, had a mess of sweet green-corn—what was called 'hot corn,' by the servants. Since I have turned my attention to planting, O how often I have wished for ONE such ear of corn to plant in my fatherland." The friend listened, and as he said this, impulsively went to a trunk, fumbled hastily to the bottom, and produced his ear of corn, exclaiming: "Now I know why I had to bring this ear of corn with me; take it, for it must be for you;" and related his impression of mind. Meshullam thanked God aloud before them, and said: "Yes, surely it was the heavenly Spirit from God that put it into your heart to bring it so far; for none but He knew how greatly and often I had desired to obtain some. I never saw so large an one as this."

And, as has been previously mentioned in the first part of this communication, from an ear of corn (sent from America only three years since) a thousand fold has been the result—affording sustenance to many souls. From this lesson in natural things, let us, Christian brethren, hope that from even the small and feeble effort now put forth for Israel's salvation into Christ Jesus, our heavenly Father may spiritually work as multiplying results as have been accomplished by "one ear" of corn.

GRAND LIGNE MISSION.—We learn that the Grand Ligne Mission has been and is still suffering severe deprivation; and that the health of Madame Feller, from the effects of fatigue and anxiety, is in a precarious state, awakening apprehensions for the result. The receipts for the support of this mission have greatly fallen off.

REVIVAL AT LINCKLAEN.

LINCKLAEN, Chenango Co., N. Y.,
May 14th, 1852.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

I have read with interest the accounts of revivals in various parts of our beloved Zion, as they have come to us through the Recorder; and as I suppose intelligence of the kind is alike interesting to others, I thought it my duty to let you know what the Lord has been doing for his people at Lincklaen. Although I cannot chronicle so large a number of conversions as others, yet I thank the good Lord for the hope that a few have passed from death unto life. Our Sabbath meetings began to be more than usually interesting about the last of February. We then commenced holding meetings every other evening, and continued them until the first of April. The Spirit of the Lord was evidently in our midst, and before we were aware, sinners were inquiring to know what they must do to be saved. The result has been the conversion and restoration of about twenty-five souls. Twelve have publicly acknowledged their faith in Christ by submitting to the ordinance of baptism, and have united with the church. Five others have united, making in all seventeen. We think there are others lingering about the skirts of Zion who ought to be gathered in. Truly, the Lord has been good to us.

PRESBYTERIAN GENERAL ASSEMBLY.—The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, New School, is now in session at Washington. One prominent theme of discussion during this meeting will be what is called in the denomination "Church Extension"—a subject very likely to disturb some nicely-adjusted relations now existing between the New School Presbyterians and the Congregationalists of New England. At present, both these great bodies, differing only in matters of church government, are united in the American Home Missionary Society, and this Society disburses its funds to deserving applicants of either denomination in destitute regions in this country. Should the Assembly establish a "Board of Church Extension" to push its own interests, while drawing funds largely from the Home Mission Society, it would probably lead the Congregationalists to establish a similar Society of their own—the consequence of which might be, either the crippling or extinction of the American Home Missionary Society.

An official report on the subject of church extension, represents that the Presbyterian Church has made little or no progress during six years past, and with a view to its extension, proposes, first, to do something for ministerial education; secondly, to explore regions where they have as yet little or no foothold; thirdly, to publish a series of doctrinal tracts.

THE LIQUOR LAW IN MASSACHUSETTS.—The Liquor Law passed by the Legislature of Massachusetts was vetoed by the Governor, who professed not to be opposed to the bill, but to the open ballot to be taken on it. The Senate immediately tried to pass the bill over the veto, but the vote was not quite two-thirds, being 23 to 15. It was then amended, so as to restore the secret ballot, and passed by a large majority. Subsequently the House insisted on amending it so as to strike out the clause submitting it to the people. The change was agreed to by the Senate, and in that from the bill was sent to the Governor for his signature. The Governor affixed his signature to the Bill on Sabbath morning last, and it is now a law of the State, to go into effect on the 21st of July. So the old Bay State stands with Maine, Minnesota, and Rhode Island, for Temperance and Prosperity, for Virtue and Order, as opposed to Rum, Wretchedness, Penury, and Crime.

RECEIPTS OF BENEVOLENT SOCIETIES.—As appears from the late anniversary reports, the receipts of the leading Benevolent Societies are as follows, viz.:—

American Home Missionary Society,	$160,062 25
Am. S. S. Union—donations $45,836 54,	193,846 22
Am. Tract Society—donations $116,406 41,	342,858 93
Am. Bible Society—donations not given,	308,744 81
A. B. C. F. M.—receipts for nine months,	211,062 54

In each of these Societies there has been an encouraging advance upon the previous year in the total receipts:—

The A. H. M. Society's advance is,	$9,122 09
The A. S. S. Union's advance is,	11,911 88
The A. T. Society's advance is,	32,130 00
The A. B. Society's advance is,	31,842 23
The Am. B. C. F. M.'s advance upon first nine months of last year is,	6,243 61
Total advance in these five Societies,	$91,249 77

THE AMERICAN AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.—This Society held its Anniversary in Cleveland, Ohio, on the 13th inst. Rev. Edward Lathrop, of New York, presided, and the usual reports were presented by N. C. Platt, Esq., and Rev. Dr. Babcock. Addresses were delivered in the afternoon by Rev. Mr. Cheney, of Ohio, Rev. Mr. Gillett, of Pennsylvania, and Rev. Mr. Weston, of Illinois. In the evening, a crowded house listened with interest to Rev. E. L. Magoon, Rev. E. C. Lord, Missionary from China, and Rev. J. M. Haswel, Burman Missionary. The entire session was harmonious, and numerously attended, not only by the people of the "Forest City," but by nearly 300 clergymen and distinguished laymen of the Baptist denomination.

LO! THE POOR NEGRO!—A bill is before the Maryland Legislature, which provides that all free negroes and mulattoes who shall be born in that State after the first day of January, 1855, shall, upon their arrival at the age of twenty-one years, be compelled to emigrate to Liberia or Africa, or, upon their remaining within the State for more than twelve months thereafter, (unless in the hands of the Maryland State Colonization Society,) shall be ordered to be sold as slaves for a term of not less than five nor more than ten years, and the proceeds thereof shall be applied to the colonization fund of the city of Baltimore.

"A Bible Catechism, for Sabbath Schools and Families," is the title of a neat little book of forty-eight pages, prepared and published by Eld. W. B. Gillett, of New Market, N.J. The following is its Preface:—

"The design of this little work is to benefit the children, and to teach them to yield themselves to God. The author has long felt the need of a work similar to this, adapted to the Sabbath-Schools in the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. He has waited, hoping that some abler pen would undertake it. Seeing the disadvantages attending the Sabbath-Schools, in depending upon other denominations for books, that teach sentiments unscriptural and untrue, he has been induced to offer this to those who may think it worthy of their regard. If by this any of the young can be induced to love the Bible, and practice its truths, he will obtain that reward which he covets, and for which he will continue to pray."

Caste among the Episcopalians.—The Protestant Episcopal Convention, in session at Philadelphia last week, had a long discussion upon the propriety of admitting certain white delegates as representatives of a colored church. A Special Committee, appointed the previous year, presented a majority report in favor of it, and a minority report against it. The Convention, by a tie vote, decided not to admit them. So the question is settled for the Episcopal diocese of Pennsylvania, that churches of colored people can not be representd among the churches of white people, even by white men.

The Gospel in Chinese Islands.—Doctor Bettleheim, a converted Jew of Pesth, Hungary, and a physician, has labored as a missionary nearly six years at the Loo Choo Islands, on the Chinese coast; he finds numbers of all classes who appreciate the blessings of the Gospel, and are really followers of the Lord, though they make no profession of their faith, because certain death awaits such a step. One has already fallen a martyr. Doctor Bettleheim is far advanced in preparing a grammar and dictionary of the language, and has translated parts of the New Testament and Liturgy.

Pietists in Norway.—We recently mentioned the religious revolution in Norway. The judicial inquiry has now commenced, from which we gather that the heretics hold the errors of the Moravians—have conventicles—believe in denying God and fighting for the arch enemy, and are accused of breaking up the public religious meetings of the established church. Sentence has not yet been passed upon them.

Odd-Fellowship among the Methodists.—At the Methodist General Conference in Boston, last week, a case of some interest was decided. The Ohio Annual Conference had passed a vote of censure upon some of its members for joining the Order of Odd-Fellows, in disregard of certain Conference resolutions upon the subject. The General Conference declared the proceedings of the Annual Conference disorderly.

Arabic Bible.—The Society for the Diffusion of Christian Knowledge has prepared an Arabic translation of the Bible from the Greek text, under the auspices of Dr. Lee, one of the most eminent of modern Orientalists, and Fares Schidiak, an Arabian Poet. The present Arabic version of the Bible was issued by the Propaganda in Rome, in the year 1671, and was, of course, translated from the Latin text.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, MAY 17.

In the Senate, Mr. Underwood introduced a Bill changing the mode of compensating members of Congress—allowing a salary of $2,000 per annum, and 20 cents per mile for mileage, calculated on an air line—deducting $10 a day for absence, except for sickness—to take effect from the 4th of March next. The Senate passed the bill in aid of a Railroad from the Wabash to the Missouri River. Mr. Borland then finished his speech against the grant to the Collins steamers, and the Senate adjourned over to Fourth-day, to give opportunity for attending the funeral of the Widow of ex-President J. Q. Adams.

In the House, Territorial Bills were the order of the day, and the one authorizing the Governor of New Mexico to convene an extra session of the Legislature, was taken up. Upon this bill, Preston King made a political speech, telling the Democratic party, that if they insisted upon an endorsement of the Fugitive Slave Law in the North, they would not get it—that New York would desert any candidate who made such endorsement the condition of his election. Mr. Cullom defended the action of Mr. Mangum in ruling out the endorsement resolutions, and bore down smartly upon Mr. Clingman, the leader of the Whig secessionists, at the same time eulogizing Gen. Scott. Mr. Clingman retorted, and the House soon after adjourned to Fourth-day, for the purpose of attending Mrs. Adams' funeral.

THIRD-DAY, MAY 18.

No session, both Houses having adjourned to attend the funeral of Mrs. John Quincy Adams.

FOURTH-DAY, MAY 19.

In the Senate, land was voted to make a railroad from San Francisco to San José. The item of $350,000 for damages during the Creek War was very earnestly debated and finally voted down. The Collins Steamers allowance of $33,000 per trip passed, conditionally, by the close vote of 23 to 21.

In the House, the bill authorizing an extra session of the New Mexico Legislature, was passed. The session is limited to 90 days. The bill in regard to national roads in Oregon was taken up, and Mr. Floyd made a political speech upon it.

FIFTH-DAY, MAY 20.

The Senate debated various items in the Deficiency Bill, but arrived at no very important conclusions.

In the House, Territorial Bills were the order of the day, but nothing of consequence was done.

SIXTH-DAY, MAY 21.

In the Senate, numerous memorials were presented, including several asking for the passage of the Homestead Bill. A bill for the improvement of the Savannah River was passed. The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of private bills, sixteen of which were passed, and the Senate adjourned till Second-day.

In the House, the salaries of Territorial Officers engaged attention. Brigham Young's character was pretty freely handled. The House made a move toward the establishment of the Texan boundary, for which some $200,000 is asked.

SABBATH-DAY, MAY 22.

The Senate was not in session.

In the House, the Territories were under consideration, and the arming of the frontier settlers of New Mexico against the Indians was debated. It seems that the New Mexicans are clamoring for protection against the Indians, and Government is afraid to give them muskets, lest they might use them against the giver. It was finally agreed, that muskets should be given to the Texans and Californians, but the New Mexicans get none. It was said that, of the 61,500 white inhabitants of New Mexico, all but about 800 are native Mexicans.

European News.

The steamer Africa, with London and Liverpool dates to May 8, arrived at New York on the 21st.

Parliamentary proceedings were devoid of interest.

Dr. John Dalrymple, an eminent surgeon, and friend and associate of the late Liston, recently died in London, aged forty-nine.

A fearful colliery explosion occurred at Hepburn Pit, near Shields, on Thursday. Twenty-two men and boys were instantly killed.

It is said that the purchasers of the Crystal Palace have bought a site in London for its immediate re-erection.

A project has come up to build a tower 1,000 feet high—a modern Tower of Babel—with the materials of the Crystal Palace.

A court-martial held on the surviving officers of the ill-fated steamer Birkenhead, has acquitted them of blame.

The Rajah of Coorg, a potentate from the Western Ghauts, Hindostan, has arrived in England, bringing his young daughter to be educated. This is a new feature in oriental manners. The Rajah is accompanied by his two wives.

The statement that Meagher, the Irish exile, had effected his escape, is notconfirmed.

The weather has been rather unseasonable in France. Since the frost on the night of 20th ult. (before reported) wine and silk have taken a considerable rise in price, both in Paris and the Departments. In the Bordelais the vines in the district of Blaye, on the right bank of the river, have been so much injured, that not over half a crop is expected.

The silk weavers of Lyons are engaged with some activity in fulfilling orders for the World's Fair at New York.

Great misery exists at present among the population engaged in lace making in the mountain villages of Behemia. The people descend in bands upon the low country to beg for subsistence, many perishing of hunger by the wayside.

Martial law was re-proclaimed in Presburg on the 25th ult. Incendiary fires are of weekly occurrence in the city and environs.

The citizens of Lubec have referred to a Committee a decree of the Senate, placing Jews on an equality with other citizens.

The Emperor of Russia, by a recent ukase, enacts that Jews who may undertake to colonize the Steppes, shall receive each 150 silver roubles, and be allowed to employ Christian laborers. Both they and their emyloyers shall also be exempt from military service.

The Swedish corvette Antelope has returned to Gottenburg after a thirty-seven months' exploring voyage round the world. She has discovered, between Loo-Choo and Japan, three islands not laid down on any map.

State Temperance Society.—The fifth Annual Meeting (since its reorganization) of the New York State Temperance Society, will be held at Syracuse, on Thursday, the 17th of June, at 10 o'clock, A. M., to continue through that and the following day. The evenings of those days will be devoted to public addresses. Eminent advocates of the cause will be secured as speakers for the occasion.

The members of the Society generally are urged to attend, and Temperance Associations of every name are invited to send delegates. The crisis demands not only that our meeting be a large one, but that it be composed of those who are wise in council and efficient in action, that this annual gathering of the friends of the State Society may be the commencement of a temperance campaign which shall ultimate in placing the Empire State on the same broad platform of legal prohibition of the liquor traffic that is now occupied by Maine, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Minnesota.

The Maine Liquor Law in Havana.—The American captains at Havana, having been much troubled on account of the drunkenness of their crews, who purchased liquor of the fruit-boats which came out to them, got up a petition to the authorities to have the nuisance abated. It was signed by forty-five captains then in port, and received the endorsement of Judge Sharkey, the Consul. After considering the matter, a regulation was issued by the Captain of the port forbidding the sale, and affixing the following penalties: First offense, the destruction of liquor; second offense, the confiscation of the boat and destruction of the liquor; third offense, the former penalties, with the addition of two months' imprisonment, and then a term of years on board a man-of-war.

The Legislature of Massachusetts has passed a bill providing for three establishments for paupers, to be located in different parts of the State. To these establishments those foreigners will be sent who are unable to provide for their own support. The object is to transfer from Towns to the Commonwealth the support of emigrants who arrive in this country and need to be provided for as paupers. A hospital, connected with the same object, is to be established on Rainsford Island, in Boston Harbor.

SUMMARY.

At Auburn, N. Y., May 19th, five convicts attempted to escape over the wall of the prison. When one of them had reached the top of the wall, John Huser, a guard of the south wall, fired upon them at a distance of 20 yards; the ball wounded the convict's hand, and striking the wall, glanced off and hit William R. Conger, a keeper, who was in the nursery outside the walls at the time. The ball entered his cheek and passed out at the back of the neck. The wound is not considered dangerous. Conger had his gun raised to shoot as the ball struck him.

A man named Daniel D. Cogshall, on Tuesday last, called at Bull's Head, New York, under pretense of purchasing a horse; a fine animal worth $200 was shown to him, which he was requested to mount and try. No sooner, however, had he got upon the horse than he started off with all speed for the Providence boat, then just ready to start, which he boarded, and was carried safely to Providence. A telegraphic dispatch, however, arrived there before the boat, and on landing, Cogshall was arrested and locked up to await a requisition from the Governor of this State.

A most successful game of forgery was played in Boston recently to the amount of about $3,500 upon the Granite State and Shoe and Leather Dealers' Banks. At the North Bank, in accordance with a rule established by the Bank, not to pay money to parties unknown to the teller, the game was stopped. The checks were presented by a negro, and the signatures were so well counterfeited that they were unsuspected at the Banks.

A new pattern is proposed for the gold dollar, a very few of which have been struck. It is in the form of a ring, being as large and thick as a ninepence, with a hole in the center sufficiently large to make the piece of the requisite weight. It is a very handsome coin, and much more tangible and convenient than the little bit now in use, and which is found to be practically unfit for currency, so much so that it is already almost entirely out of circulation.

The society of fruit growers, styling themselves the "American Pomological Congress," will hold their next session in the Chinese Museum, in Philadelphia, on the 13th of September next. They invite Pomological, Horticultural, and Agricultural Societies throughout the United States and Canada to send such number of delegates as they may deem expedient, and the delegates are requested to bring with them specimens of the fruits of their respective districts.

The "way they do it" is quite amusingly illustrated in the account of the marriage of Mr. John Zulie, of Terra Haute, and Miss Rebecca Britton, of Indianapolis, in the cars on the Madison and Indianapolis railway. The reason given by the bridegroom for this railway speed in so solemn a matter, was that "all the money" he had with him was a bank note not current beyond Indianapolis, and he "didn't want to cheat the minister."

Two men, giving their names as George Pope and Patrick Harley, were arrested at Framingham, Mass., for placing obstructions on the track of the Worcester Railroad. The obstructions were discovered in season to avert the casualty which would have probably resulted. The prisoners had quarreled with the depot master in Boston, and swore revenge. They were bound over in the sum of $1,000 each for trial.

The Newport News announces that the summer visitors of this delightful watering-place are daily arriving, and taking possession of their houses or their apartments at the large hotels. On no previous year has the season commenced so early; and from the very large number of private houses which have been engaged, and the numerous suites of rooms which have been secured at the hotels, the editor feels fully warranted in saying that the coming summer will be the most gay and fashionable Newport has ever seen.

We are again called upon to record a most hideously inhuman sacrifice of life. A whole family, consisting of ten persons, residing one mile below Patriot, Ind., were poisoned a few days since, and five of the number have died. The suspicion of the crime rests upon a person connected with the family, whose own wife, and two of his own children, with a daughter-in-law and brother-in-law, died from the effects of the poison.

Experiments continue to be made in the fortifications at Mentz, Germany, to render gun cotton serviceable for war purposes as well as for blasting operations. An Austrian artillery officer is said to have arrived at the most important results. The range is much greater than with powder, with a greater certainty of the shot, and less danger of explosion during manipulation.

The Savannah News states that letters received by the steamship Isabel, from Cuba, assert that rumors were current on the Island that another expedition was on foot in the United States, of which Venezuela was to be the rendevous for the troops. The names of the officers who were to command the expedition were given. The rumor had caused considerable uneasiness in Cuba.

Several lumps of gold were discovered in a ravine in the village of Mineral Point, (Wisconsin,) on Saturday, the 1st inst., worth from $2 to $4. On the Monday following, half the town turned out to search for the "hidden treasure," and in a short time found a "lead," containing gold, silver and diamonds, and before noon $200 worth of these precious metals were taken from the earth.

Mr. Webster's great speech delivered in Faneuil Hall, Boston, Saturday evening, May 22, was telegraphed to the N. Y. Tribune, over Bain's Merchants' Line, in the short space of three hours and forty minutes. The speech is composed of about five thousand words, and was furnished in an exact fac similie of the original copy, with every mark of punctuation correctly inserted.

The Providence Journal announces the death of the venerable William Wikinson, in the 92d year of his age. He was the oldest living graduate of Brown University, having belonged to the class of 1783. He served in the revolutionary war, and was engaged in Sullivan's expedition.

The Seventh Annual meeting of the N. Y. S. Teachers' Association will be held in the village of Elmira, Chemung County, commencing on the first Wednesday of August next, at 10 o'clock A. M., and continuing at least two days.

A project is broached in the Southern (La.) Sentinel, which purposes that on the day of the Presidential election in the several States, at every poll throughout the United States, a box should be placed, having inscribed upon it "Washington Monument Box," and underneath, "One Dime to the Memory of Washington." With the funds thus collected it purposes to complete the Monument.

The well-known female traveler, Ida Pfeiffer, recently arrived in the East Indies, at the island of Borneo. She staid a short time at Sarawak, the residence of the English Governor, whence she made a visit to some of the mountain tribes. She intended to ascend the Sakarran as far as it is navigable, thence proceed to visit the Dutch possessions, and then go on to Cœlebs.

By an arrival from Vera Cruz, advices are received to the 9th inst. They bring intelligence from the city of Mexico of great excitement in consequence of a conspiracy against the Government being discovered on the 24th ult. Several arrests had taken place, and the citizens generally were purchasing arms for self-defense.

The last number of the Illinois Christian Advocate has an article on the subject of Female Education, in which the editor advocates a more liberal system of education for the ladies, and pronounces the present exclusive character of Colleges, "monastic, selfish, unnatural, oppressive to females, and injurious to both sexes."

The Indiana Senate has passed the bill authorizing free banking in that State, issues to be secured by United States Government, Indiana, New York, Kentucky and Pennsylvania Stocks. The bill had previously passed the House. It will undoubtedly become a law. It requires a specie basis in addition of 12½ per cent.

The Providence Journal chronicles the death of Judge Thomas Buffum, of Smithfield, on the 17th inst. He had nearly completed his 76th year. He has served as a Judge of the Supreme Court and as a member of both branches of General Assembly. He was a highly esteemed member of the Society of Friends.

A dispatch dated Wellsville, Pa., Wednesday, May 19, 1852, says: "The steamer Pittsburgh, on her up trip to-day, when 12 miles below this place, broke both cylinder heads, scalding one deck passenger to death and breaking the scull of another. One or two others were slightly scalded."

Great excitement was created in New York, one day last week, by a rumor that the steamer Reindeer, plying between this City and Albany, had, while off Manhattanville, collapsed her boiler and sent to their long home about 150 of her passengers. It proved to be a rumor which somebody had started too see how much he could alarm people.

The Cincinnati Times says that the intense frost last winter killed more than one thousand shade trees in the streets of that city. Every "paper mulberry," one of the most delightful of all street shade trees, is dead. Some of them are fifteen inches in diameter, and from that size down to a walking cane. Not one has escaped.

The Maryland House of Delegates passed a bill prohibiting the circulation of notes of a less denomination than $5, and it is now the law. It prohibits the circulation of foreign small notes after October next, and those of their own Banks after next March.

The Western Association.

THE Seventh-day Baptist Western Association will hold its Sixteenth Annual Meeting with the 1st Church in Genesee, Allegany Co., N. Y., commencing Fifth-day, June 24th. N. V. Hull is appointed to preach the opening discourse; Leman Andrus, alternate.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

WILLIAM DUNN, A. D. TITSWORTH, Jr.
JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

To Boston via Norwich and Worcester.

THE first-class Sound steamers CONNECTICUT and KNICKERBOCKER leave Pier 18, N. R., foot of Courtland-st., New York, forming the great United States and British Mail Line for Boston, Montreal, Quebec, Lowell, and Nashua, via Norwich and Worcester. Fare to New London $2; to Worcester $3; to Boston $4; to Bellows' Falls, Vt., $5; to Burlington $7; to Rowse's Point $8. Through tickets to Montreal $9 50.

The pier from which this line starts is the most contiguous of any occupied by the Sound Lines, to the Astor House, Irving House, Howard Hotel, Rathbun's Hotel, and the numerous Hotels in Courtland-st. and its vicinity. The passage affords a fine view of the Hudson and East Rivers, and the Route being Inland, avoids the uncomfortable passage round Point Judith, and through Fisher's Island Sound. Passengers can if they prefer, arrive in Boston at an early hour, by the Steamboat Train, or have the privilege of remaining and breakfasting on board the Steamers, and take the early train from Norwich to Boston; thus making the hour of arrival equally accommodated to pleasure and business travel.

Central Railroad of New Jersey.

Spring Arrangements, May 3, 1852.

FOR Clinton and intermediate places, from pier No. 1 North River, by steamboat RED JACKET, at 9 A. M., 1 (freight) and 5 P. M., and connects at Elizabethtown with trains on the New Jersey Railroad, which leave New York from foot of Cortland-st. at 9 A. M., 1 and 5 P. M.

Returning, leave Clinton at 8.15 A. M., 12.30 P. M. White House at 3.15 (freight) and 5.40 and 8.40 A. M.; and 1.40 P. M.; Somerville at 4 (freight) and 6.05 and 9.05 A. M., and 2.05 P. M.; Plainfield at 5.10 (freight) and 6.40 and 9.45 A. M., and 2.40 P. M.; Elizabethtown at 7.15 and 10.30 A. M., and 3.15 P. M.

Passengers for Easton, Bethlehem, Allentown, Wilkesbarre, and Maunch Chunk, Pa., and Flemington, N. Germantown, N. J., will take the 9 A. M. train from New York, and on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, for New Hampton, Washington, Belvidere, N. J. Stages leave Somerville daily for Peapack and Pluckamine on the arrival of the 1 P. M. train. All baggage at the risk of the owners, until delivered into the actual possession of the agents of the Company, and checks or receipts given therefor.

New Printing Materials.

NEW Building, No. 29 Beekman street, between Nassau and William streets, near the City Hall, Park, and principal hotels, New York. The undersigned beg respectfully to inform their patrons and the trade, that they have removed to their new building, No. 29 Beekman street, between Nassau and William streets. They trust, from the facilities there offered, by every modern improvement, to meet a continuance of liberal support. Fonts of plain Scotch faces, ranging from 100 lbs. to 1,000 lbs. weight, will be kept on hand, as well as a varied assortment of Fancy Letter, and every article necessary for the furnishing of complete printing offices. The subscribers would beg to call the attention of the trade to their metal, which, for durability, has not been surpassed, if equaled, by any foundry in the United States. By a peculiar combination of metals, arrived at from an experience of thirty years, they are enabled to cast type which they feel assured will last one-third longer than that heretofore furnished by any other foundry in the country. In proof of this, they would state, that the last dress of this paper [the New York Herald] lasted upwards of one year, averaging a daily circulation all the year, including Sundays, besides extras, of 35,000 copies; and this on their rotary cylinder presses—thus evidencing conclusively the fact of durability.

Miscellaneous.

The Clock in the Corner.

I thought, in my school-boy days, forsooth,
That the clock was a living thing—
That it had a tongue that would speak the truth,
To tell its tales upon truant youth,
In the book-hiding days of spring.

And I peeped with fear on its charactered face,
To watch the spirit within,
That was running its round with ceaseless race,
And beating the time with a miniature mace,
As if overjoyed at the din.

I marked its voice when the dear ones died,
As it ticked to their latest breath,
And, when they passed to the bourn untried,
It seemed to follow, with measured stride,
Their spirits after death.

How it rung and echoed my marriage chime,
On that merriest summer morn,
When the skies were brighter than Eastern clime,
And hearts beat fast for the coming time,
And the future yet unborn!

And when, 'mid storm and midnight wild,
On the dark and moaning earth,
There came to our love a fair-haired child—
Its monitor face beamed brightly and smiled.
To mark the moment of birth.

Thou art old, but I love thy very decay,
As thou sittest an ancient mime,
On thy wooden seat, near the kitchen way,
Where, for many a year, and many a day,
They have come to ask thee "the time!"

Keep time, old horologe, till age
Shall close thy master's eye;
And when thou art left in the latest stage
To tremble alone 'mid the element's rage,
Oh, then run down—and die.

Kossuth's Speech on Bunker Hill.

My voice shrinks from the task to mingle with the awful pathos of that majestic orator, (pointing to the monument.) Silent like the grave, and yet melodious like the song of immortality upon the lips of cherubim—a senseless, cold granite, and yet warm with inspiration like a patriot's heart—immovable like the past, and yet stirring like the future, which never stops, it looks like a prophet and speaks like an oracle. (Cheers.) And thus it speaks:

"The day I commemorate is the rod with which the hand of the Lord has opened the well of Liberty. Its waters will flow; every new drop of martyr blood will increase the tide. Despots may dam its flood, but never stop it. The higher its dam the higher its tide; it will overflow or will break through. Bow and adore, and hope."

Such are the words which come to my ears—and I bow, I adore, I hope.

In bowing, my eyes meet the soil of Bunker Hill—that awful opening scene of the eventful drama to which Lexington and Concord had been the preface.

The spirits of the past rise before my eyes. I see Richard Gridley hastily planning the entrenchments. I hear the blunt sound of the pick-axe and spade in the hands of the Patriot band. I hear the patrols say that 'All is well.' I see Knowlton raising his line of rail fence, upon which soon the guns will rest that the bullets may prove to their message true. I see the tall, commanding form of Prescott marching leisurely around the parapet, inflaming the tired patriots with the classical words that those who had the merit of the labor should have the honor of the victory. I see Asa Pollard fall the first victim of that immortal day; I see the chaplain praying over him; and now the roaring of cannon from ships and from batteries, and the blaze of the burning town, and the thrice renewed storm and the persevering defense, till powder was gone and but stones remained; and I see Warren telling Eldridge Gerry that it is sweet and fair to die for the fatherland; I see him lingering in his retreat, and, struck in the forehead, fall to the ground; and Pomeroy, with his shattered musket in his brave hand, complaining that he remained unhurt when a Warren had to die, and I see all the brave who fell unnamed, unnoticed, and unknown, the nameless cornerstones of American Independence. (Cheers.)

All the spirits of that most eventful victory, under the name of defeat—I see them all; the eyes of my soul are familiar with the spirits of martyrs of liberty. But those I see around me have no sad and ghostly look; they bear no gushing wounds crying for revenge to the Almighty God; the smile of eternal bliss is playing around their lips, and though dwellers of Heaven, they like to visit the place where their blood was spilt; it was not spilt in vain—their fatherland is free; and there is a joy in that thought, adding ever new charm even to the happiness of blessed souls. As the fabulous divinities of ancient Greece like to rest from the charms of Heaven on Mount Olympus, so must the spirit of Warren like to rest on the top of this monument here. (Cheers.)

Martyrs of my country! how long will it yet be till a like joy will thrill through your departed souls? When will the smile of that joy play around your lips? How long will yet the gush of your wounds cry for revenge—your fatherland still bleeding, down-trodden oppressed? There is a sorrow in that thought, casting the gloom of sadness even over the bliss of Paradise.

Almighty Father of mankind, let the day of thy mercy be not too far. (Cheers.)

Excuse my emotion, gentlemen. The associations of my ideas are natural. Your Bunker Hill and our Kapolna are twins—both called defeats, and both eventful victories—both resulting in the declaration of independence; but yours acknowledged before it was achieved, and supported by foreign aid—ours not acknowledged, even when achieved, and meeting foreign aggression instead of aid.

Well, past is past, and cannot be changed—but the future is open yet—and often have I bowed before the recollections of this hallowed ground. I adore the Almighty with unfaltering hope. Part of my hope rests in the justice of Him, who rules the universe and holds in his hands the destinies of mankind and of men. My people's sufferings are recorded in the book of his eternal decrees, and the tears of my people numbered in his scale. I trust in Him.

Part of my hope rests with our own selves. We know that God helps those that help themselves—and we will. We look not for unmerited good luck, but for well-merited reward—and are decided to merit it. Allow me to say, that I am proud of my people—proud not only of its past, but proud of its present also. An exile heart does not often rejoice, but I rejoice to know how my people behaved—greater and nobler yet in its present sufferings than when it bore up against a world in arms, and raised its country's name higher in its very fall than it stood ever in its brightest days. The responsibilities of my position do well guard me from easily believing what I warmly wish. I weigh calmly every incident; but joy is so communicative that I cannot forbear so much to say that I have reason to be proud of my people, and bow with profound veneration at its name. The tidings I receive entitle me to say—"Young Nero, in old Vienna's walls, thou mayest rage and pour the embers of thy fury over my people's head; thou mayest raise thy scaffold, and people thy dungeons with thousands of new victims, and drain the life sweat of my people, and whip it with the iron rod of thy unparalleled tyranny; I defy thee to break my people's high minded spirit! Foolish boy! thou mayest torture my family—break the heart of my old mother—murder my sisters, and send forth thy assassins against him who, with ill-fated, but honest generosity, saved thy crown. Thou mayest do all thou canst! Thy days are numbered; thy power is falling, and my country will be free!" (Cries of "Amen!")

* * * * * * *

And here let me cut short my words. In the place here, where the revelation of Providence is told by the eloquence of yonder monument, reasoning would be a profanation on my part. At this moment my very mind is concentrated in my heart. There stands the powerful orator (pointing to the monument.) Let his words find willing ears and susceptible hearts. I leave you to the influence of his eloquence. To me, his silent speech was the harmony of an angel's song. I leave this hallowed spot with consolation, joy, and confidence. The memory of my having stood here, honored by your attention and encouraged by your sympathy, will strengthen my patience to endure and my resolution to act, and though the happiness of Washington may not be my lot, the devotion of Warren will dwell in my breast.

With this resolution, I once more thank you, and bid you cordially farewell. (Cheers.)

A Legislative Festival among the Mormons.

A recent number of the Deseret News gives account of a grand Legislative Festival held in Utah after the true Mormon fashion. On Thursday, March 4th, at 10 o'clock P. M., his Excellency the Governor, and Legislative Assembly of Utah, convened with their ladies in the Territorial House. The Hon. Z. Snow, Ass. Justice of the Supreme Court, Joseph L. Heywood, Esq., U. S. Marshal, and Seth M. Blair, U. S. District Attorney, joined the party as guests, with their ladies.

The assembly having convened, to the number of some two hundred persons, the venerable patriarch and chaplain of the Legislative Council, John Smith, addressed the Eternal Father on behalf of the company present; of his people in the mountains; of the President of the United States, and for an end to war and contention, and that peace might be established on the earth.

His Excellency the Governor led off in the dance, and was followed by the Hon. Heber C. Kimball, and other gentlemen of the Legislative Assembly. Then commenced a recreation, and a scene opened which they alone can judge of who have been associated with the joys and sorrows and poverty and contentment of those heroes of a hundred persecutions.

There the time-honored Patriarch and the trouble-ripened stripling danced side by side. There balanced the statesman to the bride of the young student; and there swung the weather-worn young warrior with the widow of the scar-be-laureled veteran. Cotillion succeeded Reel, and the Contra Dance followed the Money Musk; and yet no jar was heard.

The prayer of the grey-headed Patriarch was indeed answered; for the halo of a heavenly embassy seemed to be spread over the whole.

At 7 P. M. supper was served in untold variety and sumptnousness.

After supper, the Governor addressed the company at some length, exhorting them to a recollection of their duties to their God in the midst of the enjoyments of the feast and dance. The remarks of his Excellency were followed by a loud and thrice told Hosanna, to God and the Lamb, from the whole company.

The dance was resumed. Refreshments were served out, equally variegated and sumptuous with the supper, at midnight; and at 2 A. M. of the 5th, the assembly was dismissed by Hon. O. Spencer, to resume the labors of legislation.

His Excellency Gov. Young, in his address, among other edifying remarks, explains his position in regard to amusements:

I want it distinctly understood, that fiddling and dancing is no part of our worship. The question may be asked, what is it for, then? I answer, that my body may keep pace with my mind. My mind labors like a man logging, all the time; and this is the reason why I am fond of these pastimes; they give me a privilege to throw everything off and shake myself, that my body may exercise, and my mind rest. What for? To get strength, and be renewed and quickened, and enlivened, and animated, so that my mind may not wear out. Experience tells us that most of the inhabitants of the earth wear out their bodies without wearing their minds at all, through the sufferings they endure from hard labor, with distress, poverty, and want. While, on the other hand, a great portion of mankind wear out their bodies without laboring, only in anxiety. But when men are brought to labor entirely in the field of intelligence, there are few minds to be found possessing strength enough to bear all things; the mind becomes overcharged, and when this is the case, it begins to wear upon the body, which will sink for want of the proper exercises. This is the reason why I believe in and practice what I do. The question might be asked, why not go into the kanyons and get out wood, which would be good exercise enough? If you would know, come up to my house, you will soon find out. Were I to go to the kanyons, the whole camp of Israel would follow me there; and they would not be there long before they would say, "Come, brother Brigham, I want to talk with you; come, I will chop this wood." How many scores of times I have undertaken to work, since I came into this ministry, scores and hundreds of times when my calling in the kingdom of God was less than it is now, have I endeavored to set myself to work, but seldom could have a chance to do so more than five minutes; some one would come along, "give me the hoe, brother Brigham; I want to talk with you," and so stop me; and no sooner stops me than he stops also. I have given it up, I do not intend to work any more at manual labor. I do not wrestle, or play the ball; all the exercise I do get is to dance a little; while my counsel room is from my office to this room, and from this room to my house again, into my sitting room, dining room, &c.

A California Scene.

Two prisoners confined in the jail at Coloma were rescued from the authorities and hung on a tree by the populace, on the 15th ult. One was a white, the other a negro. A third, who was demanded by the people, was sentenced by the authorities to ten years' imprisonment. The crime was theft. The following particulars are given by a correspondent of the Sacramento Times and Transcript, under date of Coloma, April 15, 1852:

Coloma has this day been the scene of great and unusual excitement. Two men—one a white man named Henry George, said to be from Sydney, and the other a negro named William Miller—were forcibly taken from our jail and hung by a mob. The white man was charged with having stolen about $2,500 from a miner on Granite Creek, near this place, and the negro with having stolen about $4,600 from Mr. David Martin, who resides at Columbia, near Kelsey's Diggins. Our Court of Sessions was in session at the time these persons were arrested, and the regular Grand Jury had been discharged.

The Court proceeded at once to empannel a Special Grand Jury for the purpose of inquiring into these cases. An indictment for grand larceny was found and presented yesterday evening against George, and another, for the same crime, against the negro, was presented this morning. But before either of them could be brought to trial, and while our Sheriff was absent for the purpose of summoning a Jury, the mob collected from different parts of the County to the number of some two or three hundred, and demanded of the jailor the negro boy Miller. The jailor, after a fruitless attempt to persuade the mob to desist from their purpose, and disperse, complied with their demand.

Miller was taken about 200 yards from the jail and hung, which was no sooner done than the mob returned to the jail, demanded, and had delivered to them, the prisoner Henry George, whom they took and hung to the same tree. They then returned immediately to the jail and demanded a prisoner of the name of Daugherty, who had been indicted for grand larceny, on a charge of stealing horses, and whose case had been submitted to a Petit Jury yesterday, who had not yet agreed upon a verdict.

About this time the Sheriff made his appearance at the jail, and informed the mob that a Jury of their countrymen was then deliberating upon the case of Daugherty, and requested them to defer futher measures until they should hear the verdict. The mob thereupon appointed a Committee of three to wait upon the Jury, and inform them that unless they agreed upon a verdict in about fifteen minutes, Daugherty would be hung. The Committee proceeded directly to the jury-room, and in about fifteen minutes returned and reported that the Jury had agreed upon a verdict.

The crowd then rushed to the Court-House, which was very soon filled and crowded to overflowing. Daugherty was brought in, and the jury delivered their verdict, which was that "the defendant was guilty, and the punishment ten years imprisonment in the penitentiary." This, however, was not satisfactory to the mob, and the cry of "bring him out and hang him," resounded through the crowd. At this crisis, Thomas Robertson, Esq., who had assisted in prosecuting Daugherty, appeared, and by means of a very effective and eloquent address to the crowd, succeeded in soothing the feeling and allaying the excitement that pervaded it at the time, and it wast hereupon resolved that the crowd disperse and allow the law to take its course with the prisoner Daugherty.

The Story of Caspar Hauser.

Some fifteen or twenty years since, the mysterious tale of this strange youth, found in Leipsic, was every where read. The mystery was never explained. The recent death of the Grand Duke of Baden, with whose family the tale was associated, has revived public interest in it. The following are the facts, so far as they are at present known:—

In the year 1806, the Emperor Napoleon compelled the then Grand Duke of Baden, Duke Charles Frederick, to marry his son, Duke Charles, to Stephanie Tascher de la Pagerie, a niece of the Empress Josephine. The fruits of that marriage were two sons and three daughters. All of the latter are now living—one is married to the Marquis of Douglass. The first son died very suddenly, and then the second son disappeared or died very suddenly, no records of either are to be found. Duke Ludwig, the younger brother of Duke Charles, was exiled from Court for a very considerable period by his father, the then reigning Grand Duke. A fate seemed to attend the male children brought into the world by Stephanie.

Suspicions of foul play were very general at the time, and were directed solely against Duke Ludwig, who was known to be ambitious of succeeding his father, and who hated the Duchess Stephanie and her children. Duke Charles died, and on the death of his father, Duke Ludwig ascended the ducal throne. Duke Ludwig remained unmarried, leading a life of the wildest and most criminal character. Some years previous to his succession, his father, the Grand Duke Charles Frederick, having lost his first wife, contracted a left-handed or morganatic marriage with Madame Geyer von Geyersberg, a lady of bad reputation about the Court. After their marriage Madame Geyer was created Countess of Hochberg.

While married to the Grand Duke Charles Frederick, the Countess Hochberg gave birth to four children, the eldest of whom was the Grand Duke Charles Leopold, whose demise is now recorded. Rumor was mysterious about the parentage of these children, and dark hints were thrown out as to their relationship, Duke Ludwig's name being much complicated in these statements. During the reign of this Ludwig, it happened that a wild idiotic youth was found one morning sitting in the streets of Leipsic, and unable to give any account of himself. His tongue gave forth only unintelligible and indistinct sounds. Taken care of and instructed by kind Samaritans, this youth, who had given to him the name of Caspar Hauser, gradually made known to his friends that his previous existence had been passed in a cell under ground, in which he had only seen one person; that he had never seen the daylight until a few days before his discovery in Leipsic, when his keeper carried him out of the cell, and transported him to the place in Leipsic where he was found.

Inquiries, public and private, were made in all directions without any result. Suspicions of various kinds arose, a paper war ensued, some authors treating Caspar Hauser as an ingenious imposter, others enunciating boldly the suspicion that he was the heir to the Baden throne. Facts, however, were wanting to prove the connection, and while the inquiries were still pending, poor Caspar Hauser was suddenly murdered in Nurnberg. The wanting facts have never been supplied, though the chain of circumstantial evidence has been increased and strengthened. It was known at the time of the paper war alluded to, that a phamphlet on the subject announced for publication, as containing some of the wanting proofs, had been bought off by some unknown person.

This unknown person was subsequently proved in a court of justice to have been Major Hennenhofer, the creature and confidant of Ludwig, the minister to and participator in all his dissipations. Major Hennenhofer was also seen in Nurnberg on the evening when Caspar Hauser was murdered. Were an inquiry to be made, it is possible that more evidence on the subject would be forthcoming, and the identity of Caspar Hauser with the missing son of Duchess Stephanie be clearly established. The Duchess has preserved on this subject the strictest silence. Her present position and influence in Paris might, perhaps, if the suspicions which have prevailed are well founded, induce her to break that resolution, and visit with vengeance the family for whose advantage her own sons were made away with.

Music hath Charms.

"While stopping at the town of Matamoras, a number of soldiers, as was their custom, met together, to spend their time in rude and noisy revelry. Amid these social gatherings, the sound of vocal and instrumental music was always heard. Indeed, the majority of our men were excellent singers; and as they came from various parts of the Union, the favorite airs of each section were soon made familiar; and though they generally preferred such as were of a light and trifling cast, still they were acquainted with, and often sang the tunes most popular with the different religious societies. The company to which we have alluded had been assembled some time, the wine was flowing freely, and their hilarity steadily increased; every thing seemed to promise them enjoyment. At this time a soldier belonging to a Southern regiment entered the room, and, taking a seat in the midst of the company, began singing, very deliberately, a hymn, commencing, 'Oh, sing to me of heaven!' The tune was solemn and affecting, and the language was moving and impressive. The strangeness of the circumstance at once secured the attention of all present, and, as the singer proceeded, the effect was striking; the liquor ceased to flow, the rude oaths were hushed, and the sound of their merriment died away; and when the last verse was concluded, a perfect stillness reigned; the spell of revelry had been broken, and their anticipated gayeties were doomed thus singularly to disappointment."

A Word to Young Men.

Wishing and sighing, and imagining and dreaming of greatness, said William Wirt, will not make you great. But cannot a young man command his energies? Read Foster on decision of character. That book will tell you what is in your power to accomplish. You must gird up your loins and go to work with all the indomitable energy of Hannibal scaling the Alps. It is your duty to make the most of talents, time and opportunities.

Alfred, King of England, though he performed more business than any one of his subjects, found time to study.

Franklin, in the midst of his labors, had time to dive into the depths of philosophy, and explored an untrodden path of science.

Frederick the Great, with an Empire at his direction, in the midst of war, and on the eve of battle, found time to revel in the charms of philosophy, and feast on the luxuries of science.

Napoleon, with Europe at his disposal, with Kings at his ante-chamber, and at the head of thousands of men, whose destinies were suspended on his arbitrary pleasure, found time to converse with books.

And young men who are confined to labor or business even twelve hours a day, may take an hour and a half of what is left, for study, and which will amount to two months in the course of a year.

French and German Customs.

N. P. Willis, some years since, published his testimony to a practice, in the churches of Germany, when the preacher brought any one of the main divisions of his discourse to its close, of pausing, blowing his nose, and clearing his throat, as a signal for the people to avail themselves of the interval to perform the same exercise. The statement has been sufficiently ridiculed, as a traveler's figment. We observe, however, in the Charleston News, of the 16th ult., an undesigned confirmation of Willis' statement, in the following, which we extract from a letter by its Paris correspondent:

"There are several Protestant churches in Paris, at one of which—Calvinist—I heard, last Sunday, a most eloquent sermon, from Rev. Mr. Coquerel. The building, a very plain one, has, evidently, been a Catholic church. In changing the worship, however, the chapels, or rather, the interior projecting walls forming them, have not been removed, but are now filled up by seats, so that persons occupying some of them are concealed entirely from the preacher, and he from them. The sermon was an hour in length, and divided into three parts, the divisions being indicated by the preacher's taking a drink of water, and then blowing his nose most emphatically; whereupon the whole congregation, with one accord, did likewise, making the hardest 'blow' I have experienced since landing at Liverpool. This, I am informed, occurs regularly and systematically every Sunday, twice during the discourse."

Wooden Nutmegs Outdone.—The Paris correspondent of the National Intelligencer gives us some laughable information. It appears that the French have learned to make counterfeit coffee berries of worthless flour. The paste or dough is, by means of moulds skillfully prepared, made to assume the shape of grains of coffee, whether of Mocha, or Bourbon, or Martinique, to suit the taste of buyers. The artificial grain is then baked till it takes the color of parched coffee, and retailed as such, with great profit, in the grocery stores. The practice, very general in France, of buying from the grocers coffee ready parched, facilitated this mode of falsification, otherwise impossible.

A Rattlesnake Story.

Last fall, a woman residing in the vicinity of Worcester, was picking blackberries in a field near her house, having with her an only child, a bright-eyed little fellow of less than a year old. The babe sat upon the ground in an open space, amusing himself with grasping at a clump of yellow weed that grew within reach, and eating berries brought him from time to time by his mother.

The latter, at length, intent upon gathering the fine fruit, passed around a rock which hid her child from view. She was about to return to him, when hearing him laughing and crowing in great glee, and thinking he must be safe as long as he was happy, she remained a little longer where she was.

Suddenly, the little voice ceased, and after another minute's delay, the young mother stepped upon the rock and looked over, expecting to see her babe asleep; instead of which, he was sitting perfectly motionless, his hands just raised from his lap, his lips parted, and his wide open eyes fixed, with a singular expression, upon some object which at first she was unable to discern.

Ye who can, judge of her horror, when on closer scrutiny she perceived, some four feet from the infant, a rattlesnake with its glittering eyes fastened upon his, and nearing him by an almost imperceptible motion.

The sight of her darling's peril so nearly paralyzed her, that for an instant she half believed the dreadful fascination had extended to herself; but the certainty that unless she was the instrument of salvation to her child, she was inevitably lost, in some degree restored her powers. She glanced wildly around for something that might be used as a weapon, but nothing appeared; and already the venomed reptile had passed over half the space which divided him from his victim. Another moment and all would be lost! What could be done?

In her hand she held a broad tin pan, and springing from the rock, quick as thought she covered the snake with it and stood upon it to prevent his escape.

The charm was broken, the child moved, swayed to one side, and began to sob. At the same time, the mother recovered her voice and screamed for aid, retaining her position till it arrived, when the cause of her terrible fright was dispatched.

Grafting Material.

Inquiries are frequently made for the best grafting wax, and the recipe for the best article is as follows, which was three years since invented by Major Chapman, of Bangor, Maine, which he uses in his nursery with good and almost sure success. He has used it two years, and finds it valuable; for it is very pliable, easily worked, and it contains nothing that in the least injures the scion or stock. It should be made precisely according to the following proportions:

Recipe—Six pounds of beeswax, one pound of rosin, and one pint of linseed oil. (No other oil than linseed should be used.) Then, with a paint brush, spread the wax thinly while warm, on one side of thin but closely woven cloth. Cut the cloth, when waxed, (lengthwise, as the warp is the strongest,) into strips, as may be wanted—say half an inch wide and about nine inches long—according to the size of the stock to be grafted. Grafting can be worked with these strips very readily, as no strings are necessary, and may be neatly as well as quickly performed. These wax strips may also be used in budding trees. I would again remind our citizens that, to secure succss, all "stone" fruits should be grafted before the frost is out of the ground, or as early afterwards as possible. [Bangor Courier.

A Canine Magistrate.

The agent of the American Express Co. owns a noble Newfoundland dog, whose blood, we believe, is crossed by that of a still nobler breed, the St. Bernard. He is a right majestic animal, and the incident we have to relate may prove him to be the magisterial also. Two inferior dogs got into a quarrel on the walk near the Express office, and had worried and wrangled for some time, in a style as disgraceful as anything seen in Congress, since the descent of that body from its aforetime dignity. Seeing that the difficulty was not to be ended at once, the old fellow, who had been watching the combatants from a little distance, advanced slowly to the fighters, and raising his paw, gave them a cuff upon the head, at the same time looking stern reproof at the youngsters. One of them turned tail and fled incontinently, while the other looked up at the patriarch, wagged his tail mildly, in acknowledgment of his rank and authority, and trotted off. This was witnessed by several persons, who, struck with admiration at the scene, conferred upon him the title of "Peace-maker." May his shadow never be less. [Rochester American.

Carrying Burdens on the Head.—Mr. Willis, in his letters from St. Thomas, says: "Here every female is trained, from childhood, to carry burdens upon the head. From a tea-cup to a water pail, every thing is placed on the small cushion at the top of the skull. The absolute erectness of figure necessary to keep the weight where it can best be supported by the spine, the nice balance of gait to poise it without being steadied by the hands, the throwing forward of the chest with the posture and effort that are demanded, the measured action of the hips, and the deliberateness with which all turning round or looking aside must be done, combine to form an habitual demeanor and gait of peculiar loftiness and stateliness. A prouder-looking procession than the market-women, as they come and go with their baskets on their heads, across the square below our veranda, could not be found in the world. They look incapable of being surprised into a quick movement; and are, without exception, queenly of mien—though it come, strangely enough, from carrying the burdens of the slave."

Late intelligence from Tahiti, Society Islands, represents that in all the dominions of Queen Pomare, except Raitea, there was every appearance of a revolution, especially at Huehina. The natives of that place had already denied the authority of Queen Pomare and forbidden her the island, and had chosen a "King." They are divided into two parties—on for the old and one for the new government. Forts were being erected and barricades constructed by the new government, to repulse the Queen if she attempted to land, which it was expected every night she would do.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June of each year.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress
Rev. J. W. MORTON, } Assistants.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, }

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—
The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one or two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term, Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography, Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00
Monochromatic Painting	3 00
Oil Painting,	5 00
Writing and Stationery,	0 50
Vocal Music, Elementary,	1 00
Advanced Class,	2 00
Instrumental Music,	8 00

Use of Organ or Piano, $2 00 per quarter.

Board, in private families, per week, from $1 25 to $1 50; in clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter Term, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the common school branches, with daily lectures on "The Art of Teaching," Chemistry, Physiology, Laws of Health, School Laws, &c., &c. Tuition $2 50.

Students should not be furnished with unnecessary pocket-money, neither should minors be allowed to contract debts in the village. Either member of the Faculty will superintend the financial affairs of pupils placed under their care, by special direction from parents and guardians, if funds are furnished in advance.

"FOREKNOWLEDGE."

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder :

Thinking that the discussion on the subject of "Foreknowledge" is concluded for the present, I send you an extract from the Edinburgh Quarterly Review, with which the learned editor of that celebrated work concludes a very candid review of a work entitled "An Inquiry into the Doctrine of Predestination, by Edward Coppleston, D. D." I offer it as an effort at a compromise on the long-contested and perplexing question of the prescience of God. J. S.

"One thing is plain, and cannot be denied, without the most willful opposition to the testimony of reason and revelation—that whether there are but few that are to be saved or many, God intended that we should act as if we might all be saved, and as if it depended, in a great measure, upon ourselves, whether we are saved or not. If the contrary supposition be admitted, we not only make the dictates of our conscience, and the suggestions of our natural reason, utterly fallacious and mischievous, but we render by far the greater number of the moral precepts of the Author of our religion nugatory, and the observance of them either involuntary or impossible. How does the Calvinist reconcile his doctrine of election and indefectable grace with the exhortations to watchfulness, and self-mortification, and fear, which form the leading feature of evangelical teaching? He will tell us that election and grace are the operative causes of good works. But, as Coppleston observes, the Apostles represent them, not as reasons why a man is zealous of good works, but why he onght to be. And if a man cannot be otherwise than zealous of good works, to give him precept upon precept to that effect cannot be a whit less absurd than it would be earnestly to enforce the necessity of sitting still to a man who is fixed to his chair by cords, or by a fit of the gout. It is manifestly God's pleasure, as revealed to us, both by the light of nature and his written word, that man should consider himself to be a free agent, and shape his conduct accordingly. The moral precepts of his law all proceed upon this supposition; we are certain, therefore, of its truth. What do we find also in the revelation of his will and assertion of his eternal councils and omniscience? We find only a confirmation of what our natural reason had taught us. It is true, we do not find an explanation of them; we are not instructed in what manner they are compatible with the great principle of the moral law. But have we any right to such an explanation? or do we know that our faculties are adapted to receive it? If our faculties are limited, we are sure that there must be many truths of which, as to the mode of their existence, we neither have, nor can have, the least notion, which are perfectly familiar to beings of a higher order; and that there may be many which no finite being whatever is able to comprehend.

"The question here is not, whether either of the doctrines is irreconcilable with human reason, for that is not pretended; but whether two doctrines, each resulting from the plainest principles of human reason, be reconcilable with each other. It is clear that any difficulty in this respect ought not to be considered as invalidating either doctrine, but only as proving that some principle ought to enter into the calculation, which we have omitted to take into account; and that principle is the imperfection and insufficiency of human reason, when employed as a criterion of the measures of divine providence. 'Such expressions,' observes Dr. Barrow, 'as import not that God acteth absolutely in the thing itself, but quoad nos; not that he acteth without reason, but upon reasons (transcending our means or capacity to know) incomprehensible or undiscernable to us; not that he can give no account, but is not obliged to render any to us; that the methods of his providence commonly are inscrutable; that his proceedings are not subject to our examination and censure; that his acting doth sufficiently authorize and justify itself; that it is high presumption and arrogance for us to scan, sift, or contest, or cavil at the equity or wisdom of God's acting.' At the same time, it ought never to be forgotten, that since both the prescience of God and the free agency of man are truths distinctly asserted in scripture, if there be an individual who feels more conviction and encouragement to well doing in one of these doctrines than the other, he is no fit subject of censure, much less of abuse, as long as he holds the leading doctrines of the Christian faith, and makes his principles subservient to the great ends of the gospel. The doctrine of the Calvinists only then becomes a fit subject of reprobation, when they assert one truth to the utter exclusion or practical annihilation of the other—when they press the doctrine of predestination beyond what is necessary for the encouragement of all true believers, and disparage in the hearing of those whose religion must be chiefly practical, the necessity (we will not say the efficacy) of a holy life. Surely, it must be by this time obvious to the wisest men of both parties, that no good can result to the cause of religion, and still less to that of the visible church, by the continuation of a dispute which, by its very nature, can never be decided, but which does admit of a compromise, viz., that each should acknowledge the truth of the doctrine for which the other contends, as not being able to contradict it, but only to conceive its incompatibility with his own; that both parties should acquiesce in the imperfections of human reason, and agree in the paramount importance of those duties which neither party calls in question, viz., faith and a holy life."

"OUT OF THE MOUTH OF BABES," &c.—A physician of high standing, an opposer of religion, was about to start for California, when his little child came to him and handed him a Testament, saying, "Pa, you must take this to read on the road." He pushed the child away in a passion, saying that he did not want to be encumbered with any such thing. His wife persuaded him to take it to please the child. On his way to the gold regions he was taken dangerously sick, and his companions were obliged to leave him, as they thought, to die. He became alarmed for his sins, and was about to give up in despair, when he thought of the Testament. He commenced reading it, and his mind was led to take hold of the promises, and to accept of Christ as his Saviour. He recovered from his sickness, went to the gold regions, and a few days since returned rich, not in the treasures of Egypt, but in that more durable substance that fadeth not away, eternal in the heavens.

PRESENCE OF MIND.

Presence of mind is often shown in quick perception of some device or expedient, such as we usually suppose to be an emanation of superior intellect. This has been repeatedly exemplified in rencontres with the insane.

A lady was one evening sitting in her drawing-room alone, when the only inmate of the house, a brother, who for a time had been betraying a tendency to unsoundness of mind, entered with a carving knife in his hand, and said, "I wish to paint the head of John the Baptist, and I think yours might make an excellent study for it. So, if you please, I will cut off your head." The lady looked at her brother's eye, and seeing in it no token of jest, concluded that he meant to do as he said. There was an open window and a balcony by her side, with a street in front; but a moment satisfied her that safety did not lie that way. So, putting on a smiling countenance, she said, with the greatest apparent cordiality—"That is a strange idea, George; but would it not be a pity to spoil this pretty lace tippet I have got? I'll just step to my room to put it off, and be with you in half a minute." Without waiting to give him time to consider, she stepped lightly across the floor, and passed out. In another moment she was safe in her own room, whence she easily gave the alarm, and the madman was secured.

A lady one day returned from a drive, looked up and saw two of her children, one about five and the other about four years old, outside the garret window, which they were busily employed in rubbing with their handkerchiefs, in imitation of a person whom they had seen a few days before cleaning windows. They had clambered over the bars which had been intended to secure them from danger. The lady had sufficient command over herself not to appear to observe them. She did not utter one word, but hastened up to the nursery, and, instead of rushing forward to snatch them in, which might have frightened them, and caused them to lose their balance, she stood a little apart, and called gently to them, and bade them come in. They saw no appearance of hurry or agitation in their mamma, so they took their time, and deliberately climbed the bars, and landed safely in the room. One look of terror, one tone of impatience from her, and the little creatures might have become confused, lost their footing, and been destroyed.

THE SMOOTH SHILLING.

"That piece won't go, sir!" observed the man behind the counter, handing me back again a shilling so worn that nothing could be seen on either side of it but a dull silvery luster, and no perceptible figure. I took it, and replaced it in my purse. But as I rode homeward my meditations were of the shilling. It won't go, he said; but why not? It is no doubt a genuine coin. For ten, twenty, or even fifty years, it has been in constant circulation. The hands of some thousands of persons have held it. It has sparkled as a pretty toy in the tiny fingers of some sweet child; is has been clutched by the ferruginous hand of the miser. It has laid upon the glazed eyeball of a youth in the shroud; clinked in the till of the liquor dealer; been tossed to the street musician as an inducement to him to cut short the agony of his organ. It has traveled through all the States, passing current from the seaboard to the remotest interior, and never at a discount. It has been exchanged in its time for commodities enough to make any beggar a Crœsus. To multitudes it has brought, over and over again, in some shape, the worth of a shilling. Others have possessed and lost it, but obtained no equivalent. It was their fault, however, and not the shilling's. But now the tide is turned. The faithful piece of money would seem to be delinquent. "It won't go." But why not? again I ask. Because it is smooth. Its surface tells no tale that we can credit. It bears not the impress of the mint, or the government insignia. No head, pillars, or date does it show. A coin must have impressions, or it is only a plaything, a medal, or a silver button-mould. Smooth pieces of silver "won't go" any better than if they were bits of my grandmother's spoons, or those famous old knee-buckles that figured on my grandfather's small-clothes. The genuine current coin must have the genuine stamp.

Here, thought I, is a lesson for us. Our minds, hearts, and lives must bear the right impressions, or we cannot pass current in good society. Of little worth is he in life of whom "the smooth shilling" is a type. The man on whom you can see no head, or date, or stars, or pillars, or eagle, nothing by which it could be guessed that he was "E pluribus unum," his expression only the dull resemblance of tarnished silver, his eyes of pewter, in which there is "no speculation," his soul unmarked with any trace or bound of moral obligation, of generous sympathy, of Christian fervor; every body is ready to say of him, as said the tradesman of the shilling, "That piece won't go, sir." It ought not to go. It has been loosely drifting about long enough. Is is time it was returned to the mint as bullion, to be re-issued, to receive the stamp of a man. Ah! there is the fault with him. It was the original sin of his education, that no deep, strong, correct impression was made upon his nature. He had no pious mother to furrow his soul with her tears; no godly father to drive landmarks deep into the substance of his spiritual existence. The pulpit did not raise along the margin of his affections the breast-work of faith and hope and fear of God. The sanctions of the Bible were either unknown or unheeded, so that no "image and superscription" of divine truth was ever inscribed upon him when in the mint of his years, his plastic infancy. The world, the flesh, and Satan, have made him rough enough, but no trace of the divine government is on him, no stamp of the powers above. He is smooth for all such impressions, and therefore he cannot pass current. Reader, are you a parent, a teacher, a pastor, a Christian, a lover of your race? Put your stamp upon the young. Prepare the die with greatest care. Improve your opportunity. Make your mark. Let it be deep and indelible. Let each immortal coin, each living soul, be charged with the image, not of an earthly queen or emperor, but with the features of our heavenly King, with the radiant lines of the Redeemer's face, and then shall it be legal tender in the Church below and at the gates of the new Jerusalem. "I WON'T BE A MINUTE."

"I won't be a minute!" is the excuse to others, and often to ourselves, from turning aside from the pursuit of some important plan, to gratify a petty curiosity, or other worthless feeling.

I had promised J. B.——, on Tuesday, to meet him at several places in London, on points of business of great consequence to me, upon which depended the issue of certain legal proceedings pending between us. I breakfasted with him in the morning, at his house in Greenwich, and we came up to the city together. Every thing promised well for a settlement satisfactory to me, till my unlucky disregard of the value of "just one minute," destroyed all the plans which had taken time, labor, and money to bring into such a prominent position.

"I won't be a minute!" said I, turning aside from my companion, and stopping at a shop window to admire some prints. They were beautiful, and I could soon overtake J. B——, so in I went to inquire the prices. The shopman was obliging, and I was delighted; and thus two minutes fled.

With a hurried step I re-entered the street, under the impression that a quicker pace would presently bring me to my companion's side. An incident, however, had happened in the crowded thoroughfare, and five minutes more had elapsed before I could get a fair start to overtake my friend; and then, in walking quicker than the mass, I found that I was not only impeded by the passengers I met, but, moreover, by those whom I overtook.

"Five minutes to twelve!" said my watch. At twelve we had agreed to meet a legal gentleman of noted punctuality at his chambers in Chancery-Lane, but I was only yet in Cheapside. At the crossing near St. Paul's, the tide of carriages, cabs, and omnibuses, rendered it impossible for me to get on without considerable delay, and the clock reminded me that the time of our appointment had already passed before I entered Ludgate Hill.

"Ten minutes past twelve!" said my watch, when, annoyed and heated, I tapped at the door of Mr. Law's chambers. Rap, rap, rap! No answer. J. B—— must have called, transacted his business, and gone. Rap, rap, rap! No answer still. A clock in the vicinity chimed "a quarter past;" we were to have met another professional man at Somerset House. I could not, nevertheless, give up the idea of seeing Mr. Law, knowing what had been done, without an effort; so I knocked at the door of the adjoining rooms. "Mr. Law is likely to be found at his registrar's office," said the inmate; so thither I hurried. I had some trouble in finding the place; and when I had done so, I learned from the porter that Mr. Law and a friend had been there, but had gone away, whither, no one knew. The clock chimed half-past, and it was more than five minutes' walk to Somerset House. I resolved to take a cab, but not one could be had; so, hurriedly walking away, I rushed to endeavor to keep my second appointment.

"Twenty-three minutes to one!" said my watch, as, almost breathless, I sprang up the stairs at Somerset House. The official informed me with coolness that J. B—— had been waiting several minutes for me, and that, as I had not kept the other engagement he had concluded that I had no objection the the law-suit proceeding, and so had left just in time to catch one of the Greenwich steamboats at Hungerford pier.

"Sixteen minutes to one!" said my watch. I rushed into the Strand. "Cabman, drive me with all haste to Hungerford pier," said I, jumping into a vehicle, and smashing my hat against the top. Away we went, as fast as the lean horses could carry us. "Every moment is of importance!" I shouted through the window to the driver, who lashed his poor beasts to a gallop.

"Fourteen minutes to one!" said my watch, as I rushed on to the pier. "Just too late, sir," said the money-taker; "our boats leave here every quarter of an hour, and the last has been gone just one minute!"

I missed J. B——, who refused afterwards to enter into any negotiations for the settlement of our dispute, the law-suit went on, and I had to pay damages and costs.

The moral is plain; never allow any good opportunity to pass, or it may chance that insuperable difficulties will prevent its ever being overtaken.

REPLY OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—"The gallant Duke" lately met a young clergyman, who, being aware of his Grace's former residence in the East, and of his familiarity with the ignorance and obstinacy of the Hindoos in support of their false religion, gravely proposed the following question: "Does not your Grace think it almost useless and extravagant to preach the gospel to the Hindoos?" The Duke immediately rejoined, "Look, Sir, to your marching orders: 'Preach the gospel to every creature.'" (Mark 16:15.)

THE SORROWS OF BEREAVEMENT.

It was not at that mournful hour
  When first thy spirit fled,
And life's last smile was on thy brow,
  I felt that thou wert dead.

But oh! when weary days were past,
  And thou away wert gone,
And I, in silent wretchedness,
  Had wept and prayed alone;

When lighter friends looked coldly on,
  Or faithless from me fled,
Or strove to heal, and wounded more,
  I felt that thou wert dead.

And when I passed along the walks,
  Where thou with me hadst been,
And stood alone where both had stood,
  In every gentle scene;

And saw the glorious sun and sky,
  And felt the balmy air,
And heard a thousand happy sounds,
  And knew thou wert not there—

Oh! then I felt that all the charm
  That made it bright was fled,
I turned away in bitterness,
  And wept that thou wert dead.

And when I hear the silvery sounds
  We both have loved to hear,
And think that all their sweetness now
  Will never reach thine ear;

Or read the books we both have loved,
  Of verse, or learned lore,
And miss the eye, the voice, the smile,
  That made it sweet before;

Or when, through sad and lonely hours,
  I long thy face to see,
And think that all this bitter grief
  Is nothing now to thee—

Oh! then I feel from earth, from me,
  Forever thou art fled,
And too, too keenly then I feel
  That one so loved is dead.

THE UNGRATEFUL SON.

"The eye that mocketh at his father, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out." Prov. 30: 17. This is a terrible denunciation against ingratitude to parents, and even in the present day is sometimes virtually fulfilled.

Some years ago, an Irish gentleman, who was an extensive contractor on our public works, was reduced to poverty by the profligacy and dishonesty of an ungrateful son. The old man lost his wife, and, to add to his calamity, his health failed; and, to fill the cup of his sorrow, he lost his sight. Thus poor, friendless, blind, and forsaken, he found an asylum in the Franklin county alms-house, Pennsylvania.

While an inmate of this refuge for the afflicted, his wicked and ungrateful son traveled that way; he was informed of his father's situation, and that his parent wished to see him; and although he passed within two hundred yards of the alms-house, he refused to stop and see the kind father he had ruined. Now mark the result. The very day he passed the alms-house on his way to Gettysburg, in an open carriage, he was overtaken by a storm, and took a severe cold that resulted in the destruction of his eyes. He lay in Gettysburg in a critical situation until his funds were exhausted, and those who had him in charge took him to the Franklin county alms-house.

The day he was brought in, his father, having died the day before, was carried out. He was put in the same room, and occupied the same bed, and in a short time followed his neglected and heart-broken father to the judgment-seat of Christ. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of an angry God.

STARVATION OF MISSIONARIES.

The London papers contain a heart-sickening account of the death of a party of missionaries from hunger. We condense the particulars :—

An English officer, Capt. Gardiner, of the Royal Navy, who was sent out with six companions by the "Patagonian Missionary Society," to the neighborhood of Cape Horn, has been literally starved to death—he, and his companions with him. The party consisted of Capt. Allen Gardiner, R. N., superintendent; Mr. Williams, surgeon and catechist; Mr. Maidment, catechist; John Erwin, carpenter; John Badcock, John Bryant, and John Pearce, Cornish fishermen. They left England in September, 1850, in the bark Ocean Queen, it having been promised that stores should be forwarded to them in June, via the Falkland Islands; should they be unable to maintain their position at Picton Island, Beagle Channel, it was supposed that, being provided with partially-decked launches, they would fall back on Staten Island.

The ill-fated party landed on Picton Island towards the conclusion of the year 1850. From the first, they seem to have been annoyed, in some measure, by the natives, and to have been hunted backwards and forwards from the little island to what may be called the mainland of Terra-del-Fuego. About the middle of April, 1851, Capt. Gardiner begins to record in his diary, which has been preserved to us, that "they have provisions enough to last them two months, but some are very low." They have but a flask and a half of powder; their fishing net washed away. They shoot an occasional fox, which serves them for food; and, besides, if they did not destroy the animal, he would do his best to steal the remainder of their little stock of provisions. The scurvy breaks out among the party. They are driven to take refuge in a cavern; but the tide rolls in, and Capt. Gardiner and Mr. Maidment, the catechist, are obliged to swim out for their lives, and take refuge upon a clump of rock, round the base of which the waves of the South Atlantic are breaking. Upon this rock the two poor creatures kneel down in prayer. John Badcock, a Cornish fisherman, dies. By July 4, the party have been seven weeks on short allowance; their only hope is in the expected ship from the Falkland Islands; but no ship comes. They greedily eat a penguin, a shag, a half-devoured fish washed upon shore. Six mice are spoken of in the journal as dainties. The garden-seeds have been used for broth, and are all spent. Mussels and limpets are the next resource—and then rock-weed is boiled down to a jelly. Erwin, a carpenter, and Bryant, another Cornish fisherman, die. Two of the party, Mr. Williams, the surgeon, and Pearce, a third Cornishman, had gone away from the main body of the party, for some object or other, probably for the discovery of food. Their dead bodies were discovered at Cook's River, some distance off. The presumption is that they must have died about the same time as Capt. Gardiner himself, who probably expired on the 6th of September. The last entry in his diary is on the 5th of September, and in this he mentions that he had not tasted food or water for four days. Mr. Maidment, the catechist, had died a few days before.

It was the 6th of January, 1852, before Capt. Morshead, to whom orders were sent by the Admiralty in October, arrived at the Island. After many hours of fruitless search on the coast of Picton Island, on the 20th of January, some writing was seen by Capt. Morshead's party on a rock across a river. The words were, "Go to Spanish Harbor." On another rock adjoining was, "You will find us in Spanish Harbor." On a third piece of rock, "Dig below," which they instantly did, but found only a broken bottle, without any paper or directions. On searching one of the numerous wigwams in the neighborhood, they read on one of their poles, "A bottle under this pole," but they could not find it; but it was evident, from some fragments of stores found on the spot, that the mission had rested here. On the following morning Capt. Morshead sailed for Spanish Harbor, where they saw a boat lying on the beach, and where they found the bodies of Capt. Gardiner and Mr. Maidment, unburied. On one of the papers found was written legibly, but without a date, "If you will walk along the beach for a mile and a half, you will find us in the other boat, hauled up in the mouth of a river at the head of the harbor, on the south side. Delay not—we are starving." Close to the spot where Capt. Gardiner was lying was a cavern, to which attention was directed by a hand painted on the rocks, with "Psalm lxii. v. 58" under it. Here were found the papers referred to, and two unfinished letters were written to his son and daughter by Capt. Gardiner. The remains were buried close to this spot by the ship's company.

From the Mother's Magazine.

SEED SOWN IN WEAKNESS.

"No prayers?"

"No, indeed, Misse!"

"No one to say grace at table?"

"No, ma'am—not as ever I know'd of."

"Well, Julee—your name is Julee, isn't it?—you may go down stairs to your mistress, and say to her that I would like to see her a few moments before tea."

"Yes, ma'am;" and the domestic departed to do as she was bid.

Mary Henly had just arrived in the stage at Beechlawn, the residence of Colonel Layton, in one of the interior counties of Virginia. Her services as an instructress of the Colonel's children had been secured by a mutual friend, and Mary had proceeded forth, alone, to fulfill among strangers, her functions as "Teacher." After a kind reception from Mrs. Layton, in the parlor, she had been shown to her own room, where there was a pleasant fire, and a servant to wait upon her.

The conversation detailed above, was the first intimation our adventurous young lady had had that the family in which she was now to be domesticated, was an irreligious one. Perplexed at the discovery, she sent down for Mrs. Layton, determining to open her heart fully to that lady. Presently she appeared, and Mary, with rather a painful and embarrassed air, began—

"I think, Mrs. Layton, that I shall hardly remain with you; and it would be as well, I suppose, to have the matter so understood at once."

"Why, Miss Henly, you surprise me!—has anything happened?" asked the lady, anxiously.

"I am told you have no church privileges in your neighborhood. I did not know of this before, or certainly I should not have come," continued Mary.

"This is indeed true, as I am most sorry to say," replied Mrs. Layton, "but I thought you had been informed of that fact."

"And then you have no family services, I suppose," observed the other, in an inquiring tone.

"We have not; and deeply to my regret I say it," answered the lady of the house; "my husband is not a professor of religion; and as for myself, although I am an unworthy communicant in the parish church, which is some ten miles distant, yet what can I do with a worldly-minded husband to oppose me, together with a large family of unruly domestics to annoy and trouble me?"

"And your children, madam?"

"Why, I confess to you, Miss Henly, that I am derelict in my duty towards them, and they have not received the spiritual culture which I could have desired. But, my dear Miss Henly, you must not think of leaving us. You are the very kind of person we need among us. I am sure of it; your earnestness, and your candid way of treating this matter, convinces me that you are the very individual we want;" and the tears glistened in Mrs. Layton's eyes as she spoke.

Miss Henly hesitated for a moment, not knowing exactly what to do or to say.

"I certainly cannot consent to withdraw myself from all means of grace," said she; "and there is only one remedy that I can perceive in this emergency, and that is to bear the burden of family prayer upon my own shoulders—though this, I suppose, would hardly be assented to at Beechlawn."

"Indeed, and it will be assented to, and most joyfully," interposed Mrs. Layton; "my husband often says, in his more serious moods, that the children are growing up like heathens of the wilderness. He is a sensible man, although so worldly; and for the children's sake, as well as the servants', I am sure he would interpose no objection to your performing that duty, whatever might be his sentiments in regard to a wife's taking the lead in such a matter."

"Very well, Mrs. Layton," said the other, "my scruples are entirely overcome, if this be the understanding; but the ordeal will be a desperate one, I assure you—it being a new and untried position in which I shall be placed. God's grace, however, is promised to the weak and to the trembling, when pursuing that path to which duty points the way. Shall we not now, my good friend," continued Mary, "kneel down, and ask God that he would lighten this heavy load which so presses upon us. I know that prayer will give us strength."

And they did so—and they rose up from their knees, those two feeble, but God-fearing females, well resolved in heart and purpose for the contemplated work of reform in the domestic usages of Beechlawn.

It was a heavy task, to be sure, and Miss Henly found all her resolution faint enough for the enterprise; yet, though her feeble voice faltered, and her frame trembled as she proceeded in the evening devotions, around that assembled fire-side, her well-grounded purpose failed not, and she was "strong in faith, giving glory to God." * * *

The ice was broken, and a new leaf was turned over in the family of Col. Layton. Morning and evening, at a certain signal, the inmates assembled—the servants, too, crowded in and about the door, for the Colonel would have it so—while a hymn was sung—Mary was a beautiful singer—and a chapter read, and a simple, but faithful prayer offered up—all kneeling, even to the stubborn "marrow-bones" of the Colonel, himself all unused to such a mood of heart, or posture of body; for his wife had sweetly overcome him and had brought him to it. O, it was a triumph of principle, that, and it brought a harvest of consolation—even the "peace which passeth all understanding," into the hearts of those two feeble females, feeble in physical endurance, but strong in that strength which arises from an honest and sincere purpose!

Yes, a revolution was brought about at Beechlawn. The recent death of a distant relative of the family gave apology, too, to certain other innovations, such as the accustomed Christmas dancing parties; for which, in truth, Mrs. Layton herself had little inclination, but which long-established usage in Virginia had rendered requisite—that is, as things were. Soon it got noised abroad among the servants, that "Mas' John won't goin' to have any more dances at his house, and the big dinners, they all be done for too; 'cause why? Mas' John's got concerned in religion—holds prayer in his family, mornin' and night—an' all de color'd persons come into de parlor to join in de worship."

"The mischief!" said Capt. Joe Maclin—a capital hand at a "big dinner," and second to no man in a fox chase.

"What's the world coming to!" exclaimed Isaac Roebuck, a profligate young gentleman of large estate, but of loose morals, and whose "whole soul" was in a dancing frolic, with a plenty of "good liquor" to inspirit it.

Such were some of the ejaculations which the neighborhood "roysterers" gave utterance to when they first learned, through the tattle of the negroes, that a revolution was begun in the family of their ancient "compatriot-in-arms," their fellow-laborer in polite debauchery. And by this means it came about that Beechlawn got to be considered as neutral ground; and during the course of that whole summer, it was hard to tell on which side of the moral balance the premises should be placed, or whether, in such sense, it belonged to God or to Mammon. Common rumor, and "negro testimony" had, as will have been seen, rather overdone the matter; reports are noted for accretion in their progress, and the instance here related was no exception to the rule. But one good result, however, followed, namely, that the ancient usages of Beechlawn were infringed upon; and the Colonel's old companions began to look "slantwise," as the expression is, towards him, when accidentally he met them in public. Nor was he at all sorry that such manifestations of "cutting his acquaintance" were made, for he had long deprecated a course of life which his better judgment utterly condemned, but which seemed to be without any remedy.

Providentially, too, the next autumn proved unusually sickly in that region of country, and the quiet abode at Beechlawn was called for its full share in the general calamity. Death had entered that habitation, and, as is so often the case, had stolen thence the pet-lamb of the flock. Rosa Layton—just turned of seventeen, was the victim; the pride of that household, the comfort and joy of her parents, the beloved of all who knew her. It was a terrible stroke! But it came seasonably for the recovery of one, himself far gone in forgetfulness of God and eternal things. The affliction went home with sure aim and efficacy to the heart of that sorrowing parent; and as he stood melted and stricken down beside the grave of his beloved Rosa, he vowed such a vow as required all the remainder of the days of his earthly pilgrimage to fulfill: "I here dedicate, O God, both my soul and body to thee and thy service, in a sober, righteous, and godly life!" And these were the words of that heaven-recorded vow; nor was it made in vain. Soon Miss Henly was relieved of her burden of duty at the family altar, and the rightful person henceforth officiated there. He found peace and joy in believing, and became ever after and to his death an exemplary and pious man.

As for that worthy girl, Mary Henly, soon after entering upon her duties as teacher in the family, she began to cast about her for a further sphere of usefulness. In company with the Colonel's, children she visited the poor of the neighborhood, and prevailed upon them to send their children to a Sunday school, which she began in an old unoccupied house upon the outskirts of the Beechlawn premises. The burden of the school, of course, fell upon Mary, for there was none other to take the advance in the praiseworthy scheme; but a gracious assistance was vouchsafed to her in this, as in other and more onerous duties, such as have already been detailed; and the work throve under her superintending care and "labor of love." Others began to be interested in "doing good," and before the year expired, she had the satisfaction to find a large and flourishing society actually growing out of the little nucleus—as it were, a seed—planted by her hands, in weakness and trembling.

The Sabbath Recorder.

New York, June 3, 1852.

DENOMINATIONAL SINS.

Two weeks ago, we took occasion to remark upon the sin of Sabbath-breaking, as instanced in certain forms among our people. But how much good did it do? Scarcely was the ink dried upon our paper, when we witnessed a repetition, if not of the identical forms of profanation which we had spoken of, yet of what was so nearly allied to them, that it would puzzle a hair-splitter to tell the difference. "Then I said, I have labored in vain, I have spent my strength for nought, and in vain." Isa. 49 : 4. We are not altogether disheartened, however. "Wisdom is justified of her children," if not of others; and we trust, that a few of her sons and daughters are left in the Seventh-day Baptist denomination. At any rate, "God is able of these stones to raise up children to Abraham;" and if the children of wisdom are not to be found among the people now known as Seventh-day Baptists, He that "quickeneth the dead, and calleth those things which be not as though they were," will bring them from other places. God helping us, we will labor on. For "surely," to complete the quotation from the prophet commenced above, "my judgment is with the Lord, and my work is with my God."

We must add, that our people are grossly and criminally negligent of family prayer. We are ashamed to place it upon record, knowing the opinion that will consequently be formed of us by all the pious, and perhaps the impious, of the land. But it is what God has always known; and the unfavorable impression entertained of us by the public is nothing in comparison with His displeasure. It may be, that he whom Balaam curses is cursed; but God shall turn the curse into a blessing, when we are brought by it to see our shame, and confess our guilt. But if we refuse to humble ourselves, God himself will curse us, and it will be written of us, as of Edom, "The people against whom the Lord hath indignation forever." Mal. 1 : 4.

We speak what we know, when we testify, that there are families among us, whose heads are in good standing as church members, in which no prayer is offered in the morning, none in the evening, and not even a blessing asked at meal-time. There are many others, in which a short blessing at table is the only religious exercise attended to. There are others, again, in which worship is attended to only on the Sabbath; and others, in which it is performed only by fits and starts, or when the master of the house happens to feel like it. It pains us to add, that these inconsistencies attach, not merely to the obscurer members of the church, but to leading brethren, to deacons, and in some cases (as we are credibly informed) to ministers! Such is a true picture of the Seventh-day Baptist denomination in regard to family prayer. Reader, how does the picture look?

There have been found among us those who not only would apologize for their neglect of this duty, but even endeavor to defend it. They have argued, that it was an unnecessary thing; that it was not required by any specific command of Scripture; that it tended to render religion disgusting to the unrenewed portion of the family; and other things of a like nature. We shall not spend much time in reasoning with such people. What they need, more than any thing else, is that divine renewal which will make them willing to perform the self-denying duties of their profession. With hearts so full of love that they could die for the Lord Jesus, they would be ashamed to plead such arguments.

Family prayer an unnecessary thing! What kind of prayer is necessary, then? Unquestionably, the family, as such, needs God's blessing. How shall it be obtained? Let the master of it retire to his closet, and of his Father in secret implore a blessing upon his family, is your reply. But we have read in our Bible something about the importance of concert in prayer. "If two of you shall agree on earth as touching any thing that they shall ask," &c. Matt. 18 : 19. We infer, therefore, that our Saviour never intended that his precept concerning closet-prayer should be considered as excluding every other kind. We infer the importance of father and mother uniting together in supplicating the divine blessing upon their household. And if two of the family may unite together in this exercise, without contravening the spirit of the command about closet duties, so may three and four, and finally the entire household.

We are sure that the rule of our Saviour touching concerted prayer, is as applicable to the family as to the church, or any other assembly. Why should it be supposed to have reference only to a church assembly? It has reference to any two or more persons gathered together in the name of Christ; and in such an assembly, whether composed of a single household, or of many individuals of different households, Christ is always present, for whose sake the Father bestows his blessing.

What would be thought of a church that would hold its meetings, from time to time, without any public form of prayer? The family, however, is as truly a divine constitution as the church of Christ, and much more ancient. We know of no reason why the church should be assembled for prayer, which will not stand for assembling the family for worship. If it be said, that the design of the church is to train its members for eternity, and that therefore prayer is one of its appropriate duties, we reply, that the same is true of the family compact. God "setteth the solitary in families;" and he does so, not merely for their benefit in this world, but that they may influence one another in the things which concern their eternal welfare. It is an infidel principle, unworthy of being countenanced by any Christian, that the family relation was instituted for no other purpose but to carry forward the concerns of the present life.

As for the argument, that family prayer renders religion hateful to the irreligious members of the household, it is one which proves too much. If the daily manifestations of religious feeling, on the part of Christians, create disgust with the wicked, and should be laid aside on that account, then should there be a cessation of every thing good from the earth. But the argument is not sustained by facts. The facts are all the other way. Of course, "the carnal mind is enmity against God," and any close urging of the subject of religion upon the unrenewed, will excite this enmity to activity. Jesus Christ told us so, from the first. Nevertheless, the facts, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, show that religious effort, faithfully persisted in, is attended with the influence of the Holy Spirit to destroy the heart's enmity. Away with this argument, then! it is the reasoning of infidelity.

We have not time to protract the argument. But we feel bound to protest, with uplifted hand, against this sin; yes, this denominational sin. God will pour out his fury upon the families that call not upon his name. Jer 10: 25. Let no one say, that other denominations are equally guilty. Perhaps they are, but that is no excuse for us. If any one thinks that Seventh-day Baptists can prosper, while they aim at no higher standard of piety than that which is found among others, he miserably deceives himself. Unless we have among us vastly more piety than is found in other denominations, we cannot attain to that prosperity which God has promised to them who "count the Sabbath a delight." It is a miserable delusion to suppose that we can.

BRITISH CORRESPOEDENCE.

Sunday Observance—Modern Inquisition—Jewish Missions, &c.

Glasgow, May 14th, 1852.

Preparatory to the review of troops on Monday last, when the French President distributed the eagles to the army, he, on Sunday, attended the races, and with thousands of amused spectators, in the Champ de Mars, furnished a farther quota of the evidence for Sunday which its universal observance is held to imply. A few weeks ago, it was stated that the English Ambassador, Lord Cowley, had borne testimony against French Sunday desecration, by refusing to dine on that day with the President; we are now informed, that with Lady Cowley, the President opened the ball at the Tuilleries on Sunday se'night. Last month an opera was performed in Paris, in which a representation of the souls of the departed in the day of judgment is given, followed by another in which the demons are seen casting the condemned into Gehenna.

The Paris papers this week mention that Mr. Edward Murray, son of a British officer, has been sentenced to death by the Secret Tribunal of the Consulta, in Rome. He has been in their prisons for three years, and prevented from having communication with a legal adviser of his choice. The proceedings were all conducted in a secret chamber, and he was not confronted with the witnesses, nor permitted to examine them. The alledged crime is not stated.

Yesterday it was announced on the authority of a Prague journal, that on the 3d instant Kossuth's mother, and sixteen of his relatives, passed through that city, on their way to England.

The Annual Meeting of the Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews, was held in London this day week. The report was, on the whole, encouraging. The receipts for the year past amounted to £30,495, and about the same sum was expended. Besides their numerous missions on the Continent, they have in the East stations at Jerusalem, Safet, Cairo, Bagdad, Smyrna, Constantinople, Jassy, Beuharest, and in China. The Society has now in its employ 50 Jewish Episcopal clergymen, dispersed over the globe; and there is good reason to believe, that there are at present in London 2000 Christian Jews; in Berlin 2,500. The prejudices of that people against Christianity, the report states, are rapidly giving way, great numbers being now willing to hear and consider the grounds of our faith. In such circumstances, it surely is much to be regretted, that what is presented to them as the truth of God really is not so. It is sad to read, in the Narrative of the Mission of the Church of Scotland, that at more places than one, when the Jews declared their readiness to embrace Christianity if they were permitted to retain the Sabbath and circumcision, discouragement should have been shown, while on both points they were in the right, and the Mission in the wrong.

At the meeting of the Sunday School Union, a clergyman from Philadelphia, (a Mr. Dyer, if I remember,) was one of the speakers. Great exception has been taken to his having been permitted to occupy such a place—he being regarded as favorable to slavery, while this Society last year bore an explicit testimony against such. In the meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society, Chevalier Bunsen, the Prussian savant, was one of the chief speakers, while the Record states that he disallows the inspiration of the books of Moses, and regards as false the declaration, that God made of one blood all the nations of men that dwell on the face of the whole earth, not believing that all mankind are descended from Adam.

Considerable numbers of converts from Popery continue to be announced, both in London and in Ireland. In London, St. Paul's church, Bermondsey, is specially used as a place for exposing the evils of the system; and repeatedly as many as twenty-four have been received at one time, who have renounced allegiance to the Papacy. The Irish mission has been far more extensively successful, and fiery philippics on the part of the Popish authorities have confessed to the truth of the statements to this effect, while they seek to explain the whole by allegations of bribery. A letter from priest Mullen, in New York, confessing the wholesale abandonment of Popery by Irish emigrants, published by the Times, has created a great ferment in Ireland, and denunciations are stated to have been uttered against emigration to America, as leading to such a result.

TRACT OPERATIONS.

The Board of Directors of the American Sabbath Tract Society are doing what they can to secure the objects of their appointment, and promote the interests of the Sabbath. The following report of labors performed by one of their colporteurs, mostly between the 1st of January and the 6th of March, 1852, will give some idea of the manner in which they operate:—

"I distributed tracts in about forty towns, in Madison, Oneida, Chenango, Otsego, and Broome Counties, New York, and in Susquehanna, Luzerne, and Wayne Counties, Pennsylvania. I attended the semi-annual sessions of the Chenango and Otsego Baptist Associations, and distributed publications among the people present at those meetings. On my tour I was generally well received, and most of the people were willing to accept the publications. One man, however, with whom I conversed some time, said that if I left one he would burn it. Some owned that they were already convinced that the seventh day was the Sabbath. Others expressed a willingness, and some a desire, to examine the subject; while others contended strenuously for the first day. Some said they could not tell when or why the day was changed. Some thought there was no Sabbath under the gospel, and that it was right to worship at any time. Some thought all the authority for keeping Sunday was the law of the land, which they were bound to obey. Some claimed that the first day must be right, because so many eminently learned and holy men, who had lived so well, and died so triumphantly, had kept it. I called on a number of ministers, and conversed with some of them on the Sabbath question. Some of them purchased tracts, and said they were willing to investigate the subject.

While in Pennsylvania I held meetings on Sabbath days in a neighborhood of Sabbath-keepers, where the meetings had been discontinued for some time; and I am in hope that the meetings will now be kept up, as there seemed to be, when I left, an increased engagedness in the cause of religion.

As it respects the effect of my labors this winter in scattering tracts, as it was seldom that I visited a place the second time, I have but little knowledge, though in a few cases I learned that the truths therein contained were working upon the minds of some; and I doubt not that many have been led to think seriously upon the claims of God's Sabbath, in consequence of these feeble efforts. May the good Lord give power to his own truth, and induce many by his Spirit to walk in the truth. And Oh that Sabbath-keepers were fully awake to their responsibilities, and would so live as to commend the Sabbath to the respect of those around them, and cry mightily to God for his Spirit to succeed the efforts put forth in this cause."

"THE PEOPLE'S COLLEGE."

A meeting of what is called "The People's College Association," was held at Rochester, N. Y., May 20th. The N. Y. Tribune sets forth the following "six leading ideas," which those who originate this movement "cherish as vital." They are in the main sound and important; and we should have more hope of their being successfully carried out by this organization, if their advocacy was connected with fewer thrusts at existing institutions, as though they were not colleges for "the people," designed to place within the reach of "every youth who is willing to work for it," such an education as would qualify him "for eminent usefulness in every laudable sphere of practical life." Here are the six leading ideas:—

1. A thorough Education ought to be placed within the reach of every youth who is willing to work for it.

2. Such Education should qualify for eminent usefulness in every laudable sphere of practical life—not that each student should learn every thing, but that the opportunity of mastering every desirable field of Knowledge or Science should be presented, and each be permitted to choose for himself, under parental guidance and the counsel of his teachers, whatever branches of study should be deemed most essential to the path in life he contemplates.

3. Every advantage and opportunity proffered to male students should be proffered equally to females—which does not imply that girls shall study the same branches as boys, but that they shall have a right to do so if they choose, and that their own sense of propriety and fitness, properly educated and counseled, and not the arbitrary decrees of Trustees of Faculties, shall indicate the branches they shall study and acquire.

4. The regular and inflexible devotion of not less than three hours per day through five days of each week to some kind of Manual Labor shall be required of every teacher and student, as essential to health, vigor and longevity, to the completeness of Education; so that the professional man may at all times be able to relinquish his profession and fall back upon manual labor when conscience, health or ill success shall dictate that step; and so that the poor student may, by [diligence and frugality, pay his way, and enter upon the responsibilities of active life unburdened by debt.

5. No call upon the State Treasury for aid in founding and sustaining the People's College; though, in case the Legislature shall see fit to make grants to other Colleges, the People's will claim to share equally with them.

6. A large and excellent Farm shall be the base of the Industrial economy of the College, serving to illustrate its daily lessons in Agricultural Chemistry, Geology, practical Farming, &c., with various workshops or manufactories, impelled by steam or water-power, whereby every student shall find employment suited to his capacities and tastes at all seasons, with the best instruction in every department, and the command of the choicest implements and machinery.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.

This venerable Society held its anniversary in Exeter Hall, London, on Wednesday, May 5th, the Earl of Shaftesbury in the chair. The speakers were the Bishop of Winchester. Chevalier Bunsen, the Earl of Roden, the Bishop of Cashel, Rev. Dr. Dyer of the Episcopal Church in Philadelphia, Rev. E. Videll, bishop-designate of Sierra Leone, J. Kennedy, missionary from Benares, T. Percival missionary from Ceylon, W. Keene, missionary from Calcutta, &c. The Christian Times gives the following abstract of the annual report:—

The report stated that there had been an advance of £5,000 in the receipts; no slight proof of increased confidence on the part of the public. The circulation was unsurpassed, except on two occasions. With regard to foreign operations, it was stated that France had occupied much attention. The issues from the depots at Paris had reached 90,000; making the total distribution during nineteen years, 2,198,366. In the past year there had come forward many voluntary depot keepers, who, without any remuneration, devoted themselves to the distribution of small supplies. In Belgium, Holland, and the northern parts of Germany, the circulation had exceeded that of any former year. Notwithstanding the continued opposition of the Roman Catholic clergy and the Jesuits, it amounted to 116,937. In Germany the annual statement showed much to discourage. The issues during the year amounted to 54,511, raising the entire distribution since 1830 to 1,230,830 copies. The colporteurs had been expelled from Bavaria, but they had left behind them 8,250 copies of the Scriptures. The meeting was then informed of the events which had occurred in Austria and Hungary. In Switzerland, there were only three depots open, those at Neufchatel, Lucerne, and Geneva. There were many difficulties in Piedmont and Sardinia, arising from the opposition of Romish priests; but the civil authorities did not permit the Bible to be excluded. At Milan there had been many supplies through duly authorized booksellers. The step taken in reference to the Great Exhibition, had led to the transmission of a case to the state of Tuscany. The total issues in Sweden amounted to 1,168,895; while in Russia, Finland, and Lapland, the agency continued active. At Calcutta there had been an increased circulation. The communications from the different missionary stations were very satisfactory. The aggregate circulation at Calcutta, from 1811, was 674,654. The following is a summary of the Society's operations during the past year:—

The entire receipts of the year, ending March 31st, 1852, amount to £108,449 0s. 10d., being an increase of £5,118 18s. 2d. on those of last year. The receipts applicable to the general purposes of the society have amounted to £56,783 6s. 1d., including £34,100 19s. 0d free contributions from auxiliary societies. The amount received for Bibles and Testaments is £51,765 12s. 9d.

The issues of the society for the year are as follows:
From the depot at home, 805,181 } 1,154,642,
From depots abroad, 349,461 }
being an increase of 17,025 over those of last year.

The total issues of the society now amount to 25,402,309 copies.

The expenditure during the past year has amounted to £103,930 9s. 10d.

The society is under engagements to the extent of £52,341 2s. 7d.

To the Editors of the Sabbath Recorder:

If the views on the "Relation of Ministers to Churches," (or more especially of churches and ministers to Associations and Conferences,) in your paper of May 27th, are correct, ought not the Association to have restored Eld. John Greene to his former standing, (and so to have removed the complaint of the Richmond Church against the Association,) instead of dropping or excluding them from the Association, as I am informed was done at its late session?

Will you give your answer to the above, with reasons in support of the same, as fully as may be convenient?

Lucius Crandall.

Remarks.

We have no desire to re-investigate the Elder Greene affair. That trouble has been sufficiently stirred, and we hope that it may be allowed now to rest. We may venture to say, however, that our opinion is now, what we substantially expressed at Berlin a year ago, that it is not competent for the Association to exercise jurisdiction directly over the ministers of any of the churches. If a church violates the compact upon which it was received into the Association, the Association has, unquestionably, a right to refuse it any farther fellowship. On the other hand, a church has a perfect right to withdraw from the Association, whenever it sees proper to do so. We believe that the Richmond Church, in its letter to the Association convened at Waterford, asked no favors. It communicated the fact that it had withdrawn, and as no one questioned its right to do so, no alternative was left but to drop it from the list of churches composing the Association.

The Release of Preston.—Horace Preston, the alleged fugitive from Baltimore, whose outrageous seizure and summary deliverance into slavery we chronicled a few weeks ago, has been restored to freedom, and has returned to his wife and his home. His price was fixed at $1,100, and there was an additional item of forty dollars for the expense of getting him from Baltimore. What was the cost of the case to the United States Government, we are not informed. Probably $1,500 would cover the whole tax of this rendition to slavery upon the philanthropy and patriotism of the North.

Dr. King.—Our readers have become familiar with the case of Dr. King, through his "letter from prison," which we printed a few weeks ago. The following statement of his past services, his present position, and the secret of his persecution, we copy from the Independent:—

"When Dr. King landed on the shores of Greece, he appeared not only as the preacher of salvation, but as 'the almoner of American charities,' which he accompanied in the first store-ship sent from this country for the relief of the famishing Greeks. This introduction commended him to the confidence and the gratitude of the Greek nation. He has rendered that people other eminent services, for which he has received the privilege of citizenship. Of late he has been the acting Consul of the United States, and in the absence of the proper commercial representative of this Government in that country, we are informed that 'he has repeatedly transacted business with the Government of Greece under the seal of the Consulate.' But notwithstanding the respect due to his character and to his public services, he has been frequently molested in his missionary work, upon the ground that he was assailing and undermining the established religion of the country. These attacks have been prompted by the clergy of the Greek church; but probably have had their origin in a power lying yet back of them. As was remarked at the late meeting of the American Board in this city, the Greek church is 'the advance guard of the Russian army' throughout the East. Russia holds that church in subjection to its own political interests, and to its ultimate designs upon the Turkish empire. Hence the fear of Protestantism, especially under American influence."

Baptist Publication Society.—The Baptist Publication Society held its thirteenth anniversary at Philadelphia, on the 5th of May. The Annual Report presented on that occasion states that the Society issued forty-one new publications during the past year, embracing 6,959 pages, being 4,226 pages more than during the previous year. Of the Baptist Almanac, 20,000 copies were issued, and of the Baptist Record 32,400. The number of new stereotype plates added was 5,060. Total receipts, $42,358, of which $20,972 is by sales of books, and $5,456 for the building fund. The stock of plates and books is increased $6,644. Assets of the society, $55,953. The whole number of publications on the society's list is now 333, of which there are 128 volumes in English, German and French. Of the society's tracts, 180 are English, eight German, and three French, besides ten tracts for children. Thirty-seven colporteur missionaries have been employed in the States of Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Ohio, Illinois, Missouri, Arkansas, and in the Territory of Oregon, making eleven States and one Territory. These have labored among the Germans, Dutch, Irish, and French; also among seamen, &c. Six of the colporteurs were Germans.

Baptist Home Missions.—The twentieth anniversary of the American Baptist Home Mission Society was held in Cleveland, Ohio, on the 14th of May. Hon. Isaac Davis, of Worcester, Mass., occupied the chair, and in his opening remarks he stated that his former pastor, Dr. Going, was founder of the society, which has employed more than 1,000 missionaries, under whose labors more than 20,000 converts have been baptized. The receipts during the last year were $42,984; expenditures, $36,869; balance in treasury, $6,115; liabilities, March 31st, $30,213; balance against the society, $22,297. A resolution was adopted, encouraging the Board to collect and expend $60,000 during the ensuing year.

Endorsing Life Insurance.—At the recent meeting of the New School Presbyterian Assembly, Rev. Dr. Taylor brought in a report recommending a Society in Philadelphia, organized for the purpose of assisting Presbyterian Ministers, and the widows and children of such Ministers. The Society is on the Life Insurance principle, and the occasion of the report was the laying before the Assembly of a pamphlet describing the Institution, and also a letter from Rev. Albert Barnes, commending the Society to the Presbyterian Ministers in attendance on the Assembly. The report was adopted.

Antioch College.—This embryo seminary, for which the 'Christians' have raised $100,000 as an endowment, has been definitively located at a little village known as Yellow Springs, Greene Co., Ohio, on the Miami Railroad. Three college edifices are to be erected, each absorbing about One Million Brick. Equal facilities and opportunities in all departments will be offered to Females and Males. The corner-stone of the College will be laid on the 23d of June, when a great gathering is expected, which will be addressed by distinguished speakers.

Defection of Catholics.—The Halifax Sun states that Rev. Robert Mullen, Missionary to the United States on behalf of the Catholic University, endorses, unintentionally, a statement "that of the number of Irish Catholics emigrating to the United States, one-third, at least, were lost to the Roman Catholic church." He thinks the number who have been lost to the Catholic church since 1822, is in round numbers two millions!

Cumberland Presbyterians.—A writer in the Banner of Peace, Lebanon, Tennessee, gives the following statistics of this denomination: Communicants 77,462; ordained ministers 700; presbyteries 77; licentiates 136; candidates 110; congregations 527. Besides these, one Presbytery has been formed in California, and another in Oregon.

Union Seminary, N. Y.—This seminary has been in existence sixteen years, and during that period has educated 314 ministers of the Gospel, 90 of whom were from New England; more than 150 from New York State and city; 66 from other States west and south of New York, and 5 from foreign countries.

Work of Grace among the Karens.—Dr. Dawson, in a late letter from Rangoon, says:—

The work of grace seems to be advancing among the Karens as usual, for it is no longer an uncommon event to hear of conversions among them. In a late tour through the Karen churches in this region, Aupaw, one of the native ministers baptized some eighty-six converts. He speaks most favorably of the schools and churches, and of the consistency and piety of the Christians generally in their forest homes.

Cost of Governors and Missionaries.—The Governor General of India alone costs the East India Company more annually than the expense of the whole missionary agency in the Presidencies of Bengal and Agra. His salary is twenty-four thousand pounds per annum, and his allowance for traveling is forty-five thousand pounds—sixty-nine thousand pounds; while the whole expenditures of the one hundred and fifty-nine missionaries in the above Presidencies are sixty-eight thousand pounds.

Abolition of the Death Penalty.—Petitions are in circulation in Rhode Island, addressed to the General Assembly, and praying for the restoration of the punishment of death for murder. The Providence Journal says: "These petitions have been signed by large numbers of people. We do not know what is the sentiment of the other parts of the State, but we think that public opinion in Providence was opposed to the repeal of the law, and is decidedly in favor of its reenactment."

Sunday-School Donation.—Rev. Thomas L. Hammer, General Agent of the American Sunday-School Union, informs the Charleston papers, that the late Edward Wright of Baltimore, a few days previous to his death, placed in the hands of his pastor the sum of $1,000, to aid in supporting the branch of the Depository of the Sunday-School Union about to be established in Charleston.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, MAY 24.

In the Senate, after an Executive Session upon Indian Treaties, the Deficiency bill was taken up, and an amendment was adopted, appropriating $90,000 for judicial expenses, supposed to be mainly to pay the cost of the Christiana Treason Trials, and the catching of Fugitive Slaves in New York City.

In the House, one hour each day was set apart for the hearing of reports from Standing Committees. The consideration of the proposed donation of 10,000,000 acres of land for the benefit of the indigent insane, was postponed for two weeks. The Invalid Pension bill was taken up, and Mr. Washburn, of Maine, spoke an hour against making the Compromise measures a party test. An attempt to make the first Monday of August the day of adjournment was unsuccessful.

THIRD-DAY, MAY 25.

In the Senate, numerous petitions were presented, including several for the passage of the Homestead Bill. The House bill, to relinquish to the the State of Iowa certain salt springs, passed. The Deficiency bill was taken up. An amendment appropriating $110,000 for an unliquidated balance found to be due the Friendly Creek Indians, for losses sustained in the War of 1812, and who cooperated with our troops at that time, was rejected after considerable debate. Various other amendments were acted on, when the Senate adjourned.

In the House, Mr Hall, from the Committee to which was referred the Senate bill granting to certain settlers on the Menomonee purchase, in Wisconsin, pre-emption rights, reported a substitute making pre-emption general on all the unsurveyed lands. The Invalid Pension Bill was taken up, and political speeches were made by Messrs. Bagley of Pa. and Cartter of Ohio. The bill was passed after this long political debate, in which it was not alluded to.

FOURTH-DAY, MAY 26.

In the Senate, Mr. Sumner presented a memorial from the Society of Friends, of New-England, praying for a repeal of the Fugitive Slave law. Quite a breeze was raised on the subject, and the memorial was finally laid on the table by a vote of 40 to 10. The Deficiency Bill was then taken up, but little progress was made.

The House passed the Senate bill granting certain settlers on the "Menomonee" purchase, in the State of Wisconsin, the right of pre-emption. The amendment pending from yesterday, to make the provision general, was rejected. Several President-making speeches followed, and the House adjourned.

FIFTH-DAY, MAY 27.

The Senate received a large number of petitions, of no general interest, and then took up the Deficiency Bill, talked a while about the amendment in relation to the Collins steamers, and adjourned.

The House did very little except listen to a political speech from Mr. Grow of Pennsylvania, on the interminable Compromise.

SIXTH-DAY, MAY 28.

The Senate passed the Collins steamer Amendment to the Deficiency Bill by a vote of 27 to 19. The stipulations of this amendment are, that the Collins steamers shall receive $33,000 per trip for carrying the Mails, instead of the present allowance, with the proviso that Congress may terminate the arrangement at any time after December 31, 1854, upon giving six months' notice. Nothing further of importance was done in the Senate.

In the House, the bill granting 2,000,000 acres of land for the St. Josephs and St. Louis Railroad was passed by 103 to 76. Some discussion upon granting land for the Dubuque and Keokuk Road was had, but no one took an interest in the matter, and the House adjourned just as the quorum was about to be broken up by voluntary departures.

SABBATH-DAY, MAY 29.

The Senate was not in session.

The House passed a bill to enable Indiana to dispose of the unsold saline lands in that State. A discussion then arose on the Senate bill granting lands to Iowa for the construction of railroads from Dubuque to Iowa; much confusion was created, and the day was spent upon the subject.

General Intelligence.

European News.

The steamer Europa, with five days later news from Europe, arrived at Boston May 28th.

In England, the friends of cheap newspapers have met with a decisive defeat. The proposition to abolish the paper duty was voted down by a majority of 88; that to abolish stamps, by 99; and to remit tax on advertisements, by 65 majority.

A proposal to repeal the Maynooth endowment has re-opened the Church and State agitation in Parliament.

The Crystal Palace is disposed of, at last. The London and Brighton Railway Company have bought it, and will put it up at Sydenham, six miles from London, as an exotic garden.

The British woolen manufacturers are alarmed at the deficiency in the supplies of Australian wool, caused by the flight of the shepherds to the gold mines, and a deputation has been appointed to draw the attention of Government to the subject.

Two destructive accidents have happened in the Welsh collieries; the first was an explosion of fire-damp, by which eighty persons were killed; the other was the flooding of a pit, by which twenty-eight were drowned.

The advices from Prussia and Austria are mostly occupied with the movements of the Emperor of Russia, now visiting at Vienna.

The Austrian Lloyd publishes a list of sentences against Hungarians implicated in the last war. The names of twenty-six exiles are to be publicly affixed to the gallows. Among the persons thus harmlessly executed are Counts Alexander Teleky and Pulzsky.

The expedition against Burmah had sailed to attack Rangoon.

There were new outbreaks on the northern frontier of India.

The recent tribunal of the Consulta, Italy, has condemned to death Edward Murray, a British subject. The principal charge brought against Murray is that, during his service as officer of the police in Ancona, he associated with known assassins, and that a Count Severino and another Papal partisan, who had been imprisoned by the Republicans, were stabbed at night, while walking arm-in-arm with him away from the prison, he having had orders from the Governor to release them from confinement, and convey them safely out of the city. It is said that the trial was not a fair one, and the English visitors at Rome have petitioned the Pope to remit the sentence. Murray has already been imprisoned at Ancona for three years, amid filth, and all kinds of privations.

Italian is henceforth to be used, instead of Latin, in all recitations, lectures, &c., in the colleges of Piedmont, except by the faculties of law and theology.

In the afternoon of May 3d, the powder magazine in the fortress of Konigsberg was blown up, with an explosion that shook the houses of the town, broke the glass of the windows, and damaged the roofs of many. The magazine itself was completely leveled with the earth, and most of the buildings of the fortress are more or less injured. Three persons were killed—a clerk of the works, the sentinel on duty, and a laborer; of their bodies only fragments have been found; four other persons are dangerously wounded. One account states that the explosion was willfully caused by the clerk of the works, a pistol having been found in a position from which it is supposed he must have fired it into a cask of gunpowder.

Four Days Later.

The U. S. Mail Steamer Arctic, with Liverpool dates to May 19th, arrived at New York, May 30th.

The British Post-Office authorities have in contemplation a comprehensive scheme for the equalization and reduction of foreign postal rates.

A fire broke out in Portsmouth dock-yard on Monday, and caused great alarm; it was extinguished without serious damage. On Sunday the village of Manea, in Cambridgeshire, was almost totally destroyed by fire.

There are now in London some hundreds of foreign refugees in a very destitute state—verging, in fact, on starvation.

Not one of the twenty-six unfortunate men who were drowned by the terrible accident at the Gwindraeth Colliery has been recovered. The origin of the catastrophe is still unknown. It is believed to have arisen from an accumulation of water in an old work, which had been tapped.

In Ireland, the weather has been propitious, beyond the most sanguine hopes of the farmer, and there is every promise of a fine harvest.

The Census of France is published. The population is numbered at 35,781,628, showing an increase of only 381,142 since 1846, being much less than in former proportionate periods. The diminution is accounted for by the emigration to South America and California, and by fewer marriages having been contracted in the late troubled times.

Gen. Lamoriciere, one of the chivalric African Generals, and a man much beloved in France, has refused to take the oath, as well as Generals Bedeau and Lefro. It thus appears that many of the military names best known in France are not to be ranked among those who flatter the unhappy Louis Napoleon.

Chantilly races commenced on Thursday, on the lawn behind the town. The second day's meeting took place on Friday; on Saturday there was a grand stag-hunt in the forest, and on Sunday the principal races of the season came off.

An extensive conflagration at Dantzic, by which several mills have been destroyed, has burned also the waterworks, by which the town fountains were partly supplied. Local tradition ascribes the construction of these works to the great astronomer, Copernicus. Four lives were lost in the fire.

From India there is intelligence of fresh movements among the British troops, and of an unsuccessful expedition against the Borneo pirates.

The Celestial dynasty appears to be tottering in China. There is evidently some important revolutionary movement going on within the great wall, of which very vague rumors escape to the outside barbarians.

The British troops for Burmah were all embarked by the 30th of March. The whole force was to unite before Rangoon on the 5th of April, and Rangoon was expected to be in possession of the English by the 10th of the same month. The forces would then advance as speedily as possible further up into the country before the rainy season, and would then await reinforcements and the return of more favorable weather.

An earthquake occurred throughout the northern provinces of India on the night of the 31st March.

The Cholera has appeared again in Upper Silesia.

Accident last Sabbath—Five Men Killed.

The boiler of the new steamboat Eastern City, lying in the East River at the foot of Grand-st., New York, burst on Saturday afternoon, between the hours of 2 and 3 o'clock, and scalded five men, all of whom have since died of their injuries. Their names are William H. Stearns, captain of the boat; Charles Gormas, engineer; John B. Curtis, engine-builder and acting engineer; Francis Mayor and Charles Hall, firemen. The boat was quite new, and was built to run between Boston and Calais, Me. The boiler and engine were manufactured by Allaire & Co., and at the time of the explosion the former was being tested. About 2 P. M. 14 inches of steam had been put on, and the engine was in motion while the boat remained at the dock. Unfortunately an unobserved flaw existed in one of the boiler plates, which cracked open, and the steam rushed out of the aperture with great force, scalding the above-named deceased, and a lad named James Smith. The boat was in no way damaged, nor was the engine, and the rest of the boiler appears perfectly sound. The boiler was made to carry 36 inches of steam, but at the time of the explosion, the index showed that only 14 inches had been raised. The makers and others of the same profession say that the flaw was one of those unforeseen and unaccountable difficulties that sometimes occur, and that it could not have been discovered until the boiler was tested. Immediately after the explosion, the body of Mr. Curtis was found, life being extinct. The others were taken out alive. Capt. Stearns died at 8½ o'clock on Saturday evening. He was about forty years of age, and leaves a family residing in Maine. Mr. Gormas died the next day at the New York Hospital. He was about thirty-five years of age, and died at the New York Hospital. He belonged to Hallowell, Me. Mr. Hall was 23 years of age, and is a native of Maine. He died at the New York Hospital, about three hours after the explosion.

Overland to California.—An emigrant now on the way to the Gold Region by the Overland Route, writes from St. Joseph, Mo., an account of his adventures and observations. He says there are thousands now on the Plains, and no sign is given of a cessation of trains; they are generally in good health and spirits. He says it is a great mistake to purchase outfits in cities near the Mississippi, since the same articles can be had for less money at St. Joseph and other outposts. When he was there, mules were selling for $30 to $60; horses, $40 to $75; cows, $10 to $15, oxen, $65; oats, 26 cents; corn, 30 cents, and abundane of it in market. It was estimated that 25,000 emigrants were in St. Joseph and encamped in the vicinity. The writer says that no one ought to start on this journey without plenty of means, plenty of good humor, and plenty of courage.

Sabbath Boating.—The New Bedford Mercury says: On Saturday afternoon, May 22, at about 2½ o'clock, a sail boat in which three young lads, of from 12 to 15 years of age, had imprudently embarked for a sail down the river, was unfortunately capsized near Palmer's Island. The accident was observed by Mr. Albert Sowle from the wharf, who immediately put off in a boat to their assistance, and fortunately succeeded in rescuing one of the number, Nathan, son of Mr. Charles P. Maxfield, from a watery grave. The two others, William Howland, aged 14, son of Capt. Jonathan Howland; and Tilson Wood, jr., aged 15, son of Mr. Tilson Wood, failed in their attempts to swim to the shore, and sank before assistance could be rendered.

Sunday Caucasing.—A telegraphic dispatch to the New York Tribune, dated Baltimore, Sunday, May 30, says: This has been a day of political excitement, caucasing and speculating. The friends of Cass, Buchanan and Douglas are hard at work, but the Buchananites exhibit more energy and determination than all others. Six hundred of the friends of Buchanan, from Lancaster and Chester Counties, have taken Carroll Hall, one of the largest rooms in the city, for the Buchanan head-quarters, and have arranged for a bountiful supply of refreshments, to which several thousand tickets of admission will be issued, to last good until adjournment.

Anthracite for Naval Steamers.—The Engineer-in-Chief of the Navy (Mr. Stewart) has made a report to the Navy Department, in which he recommends the use of anthracite coal for naval steamers fitted with iron boilers, as being more economical, and entirely free from smoke and accident by spontaneous combustion. His conclusion is founded upon actual experiments in our war-steamers; and he intends, with the permission of the Department, to continue these experiments, to see whether anthracite may not be used advantageously under copper boilers, bituminous coal being generally considered less injurious to such boilers, and therefore used in the service in preference. He further recommends to the Bureau of Yards and Docks the use of anthracite in the several Navy-yards, and especially for the engines of the Dry-dock at the New York Navy yard. The day is probably not far distant when anthracite will be used exclusively for purposes of locomotion in our steamers and upon our railroads. An interesting experiment is now being made with anthracite upon the Reading Railroad, on a locomotive which has been built, especially adapted to the use of that kind of coal.

Coming down the Erie Railroad from Dunkirk the other day, (says the editor of the N. Y. Tribune,) we passed several Cattle Trains, the largest of all at Delaware City, formerly Port Jervis, on the Delaware. It was a quarter of a mile long, consisting of forty-four cars, containing 287 Beeves, 996 Sheep, and 1,514 Hogs, and paying an aggregate freight of $3,118.50.

SUMMARY.

At the recent sitting of the Schoharie Co. Court, an action was brought by Abel Stannard, to recover damages of Henry Mattice for seducing his daughter. She was about 20 years of age, and died in child-bed. The evidence was necessarily circumstantial, such as his attentions as a suitor, &c. The Patriot says that "the Jury and audience were much moved with the simple recital of the father's wrongs, and the daughter's disgrace, sufferings, and death. The Jury, after being out a few minutes, returned and rendered a verdict of $2,000 damages, which appears to have given satisfaction to those attendant on the trial.

A Circular has been issued, signed by the Presidents of twelve State Agricultural Societies, calling a Convention in the City of Washington, D. C., on the 24th of June next, at 10 A. M., for the purpose of forming a National Agricultural Society. Delegates are solicited from the various State and other Agricultural organizations throughout the United States and Territories, and where such organizations do not exist, Delegates from districts of country, and in such numbers as the friends of National Agriculture may choose to send.

Mr. Grinnell's ship Advance has just left the Sectional Dock, where she has been put in the most perfect trim, and is now fully ready for sea. Mr. Grinnell is ready at once to fit out another expedition to search for Sir John Franklin, provided the Government will give him officers and men; and of these there are hundreds ready to volunteer if they can get leave of absence. Mr. George Peabody, of London, the well-known American banker, has authorized Mr. Grinnell to draw upon him for $10,000, if necessary, to start such an expedition.

The corner-stone of a new College has been laid at Tiffin, Seneca Co., Ohio. The citizens of the county subscribed $12,000 toward the erection. It is to be 102 feet in length and four and a half stories high. An assemblage of from five to six thousand were present. It will embrace five distinct courses of instruction: 1. A Classical, or Collegiate Course. 2. A Preparatory Course. 3. A Teachers' Course, or Normal Department. 4. A Scientific, or English Course. 5. A Farmer's Course, or Scientific Agriculture.

A lake about two miles and a half long, and located about eight miles from the village of Brighton, Canada, burst its banks on the 21st ult., and completely drained out the water on the neighboring land. The rush of water dug a channel twenty-five feet deep and one hundred feet wide for a length of two miles, uprooting forest trees, carrying away mill-dams, and drowning two men. Thus occurred the singular phenomenon of a lake being dried in a few days.

Hiram Ferry and daughter, a young lady of 17, of North Wilbraham, Mass., got on the night freight train East, at Indian Orchard, on Thursday evening, and rode to Collins's Depot. Here they left the train, and were walking on the other track, when the Express train from Boston was passing under full headway. Miss Ferry was struck by the engine and knocked over against her father, throwing both several feet, and instantly killing them. They were horribly mutilated.

A Convention of Railroad Directors and Bridge Companies was held at Niagara Falls last week, to settle permanently their plans for the construction of the Great Western and Rochester, Lockport and Niagara Falls Roads, and for building immediately a new and greatly enlarged suspension bridge, which is to connect these two great thoroughfares. Rail tracks will be laid over it, on which will be passed baggage and freight cars by horses or stationary steam power. Its length will be about 800 feet.

A Canada paper records the death of Mr. Charles Boucher, of Bethier District, of Montreal, at the advanced age of 106. He was married to three wives, with whom he had 60 children! He leaves to deplore his loss, 43 children, 66 grand-children, 13 great-grand-children, 28 nephews, 70 grand-nephews, 18 great-grand-nephews, and a large circle of friends, who assisted at his funeral, which took place on the 12th of April with great solemnity.

It is stated that much apprehension is felt in New Orleans at the approach of a new disease, which is called the plague, and is now said to be prevailing in some of the West India Islands. A disease called by the same name has made its appearance in some parts of the West. It is said to be like the cholera, but more fatal. Whether it is the same disease as that which goes by the name of plague in the East, is not stated.

The steamer Cotton Plant was destroyed by fire at Napoleon, on the Mississippi river, a few days since. She had on board a cargo valued at $150,000, which was destined for different ports in Arkansas. The steamer Indiana was also partially consumed on the 25th, a few miles below Cannelton. The fire caught on the steamer Texas and spread to the Indiana. The damage to the Texas was very great.

Several persons died on board a steamer on the Mississippi a few days since with a disease which bore a strong resemblance to cholera, but was characterized by symptoms somewhat different. One singular feature of the malady was the absence of all bodily pain during sickness up to the moment of dissolution. In other respects it had the most prominent features of cholera.

Monday evening, May 24, as the carriage of William Sawyer, an eminent lawyer of Charlestown, Mass., and late postmaster, was attempting to cross the track of the Fitchburg Railroad at Waverly, the downward northern train, running at the rate of 30 to 40 miles an hour, came up, demolishing the carriage, and instantly killing Mr. Sawyer, his eldest daughter, and the driver. Mrs. Sawyer and two other daughters were seriously injured.

John Howard Payne, U. S. Consul at Tunis, recently deceased, was the author of the celebrated song, "Home, sweet Home." In his early life he was a distinguished dramatic performer, and a man of versatil genius. He was appointed Consul in 1851, and had just established himself under his flag.

Deputy Sheriff Barber, of Utica, jumped into the Kossuth train of cars as it passed through that city on Friday, and in a few minutes arrested three pickpockets. One was sent to Schenectady, and the other two detained in Syracuse.

Thomas Francis Meagher, one of the most eloquent and intrepid of the Irish Patriots of 1848, who was condemned to death, and has since been a State prisoner for life at Van Dieman's Land, because of his efforts to secure his Country's Independence and her People's Liberties, has escaped from his confinement, and is now in this City.

Kossuth's visit to America is now drawing to a close. He will soon leave for England, where his children are, and where he designs to remain until the expected outbreak upon the Continent calls him to engage in the active work of the revolution. Messrs. Pulzsky Bethlen and Nagy will return there with him.

The Pilgrim Church in North Weymouth, Mass., was broken into on the night of the 27th ult., and the carpets in each of the three aisles stolen therefrom. The church was furnished inside by the ladies connected with the society, with much toil and sacrifice, in a thorough and beautiful manner, at an expense of $300 to $400.

A friend applied to a huckster-woman, not long since, for a brace of game of a particular description. "None to-day, sir," was the reply, "but day after to-morrow you may certainly have them for Sunday's dinner, fresh from Illinois. My agent telegraphed from Chicago that they were on the way!"

The Legislature of Ohio has passed a law restricting the employment of children under eighteen, and all women, in the mechanical or manufacturing establishments more than ten hours a day; and making ten hours a legal day's labor in all cases in which the contract is silent on that point.

St. John, N. B., papers of the 25th May contain accounts of a collision on St. John River, between the steamer Ann Augustus and the steam-tug Transit. The boiler of the Ann Augustus exploded, scalding ten persons, two of whom, firemen of the boat, have since died, and another is believed to be fatally injured.

A seaman lately returned from the ship Gratitude, reports that when the G. was off the coast of Chili, six men, including a boat-steerer named Van Horn, stole a boat in the night and deserted. They made the shore about sixty miles from the ship, and in attempting to land, the boat was capsized, and four of the number were drowned.

The telegraphic wire was struck near Galena last week by atmospheric lightning, and melted for about three hundred yards, and more or less injured for half a mile. A spectator who saw the stroke, describes the electrical exhibition as a chain of fire, stretching both ways as far as he could see across the landscape.

Deacon John Ray, of Hebron, Washington Co., N. York, was killed on Tuesday, near Salem, by the morning train, north. He was driving across the track, when the train came up at a rapid rate, killing him and one of his horses, and injuring the other horse severely. His son was driving a team just ahead of him, and had just crossed the track.

Mrs. John Quincy Adams was married in the year 1804, bore her husband three sons—George Washington, John, and Charles Francis, of whom the latter is the sole survivor. George died unmarried, and John left several children, who resided in the home of their grand-mother.

Last Sabbath the steamer Atlantic sailed from New York for Liverpool, carrying Mr. and Madame Goldschmidt, Grace Greenwood, and other noted persons. As the steamer glided from the wharf, Madame Goldschmidt appeared upon the wheel-house, waving her handkerchief in farewell to the immense crowd who had assembled to take leave of her.

There is a general complaint in Central and Southern Ohio, and in many districts of Kentucky, that the first planting of corn has rotted in the ground. The cold and wet weather may be the cause, but as much of last year's corn was poorly ripened, the fault may be found in the seed.

Lady Franklin has addressed a long letter to the President of the United States, thanking him for the interest this country has taken in the search for her husband, and stating her grounds of hope that the unfortunate Arctic navigators are not lost. The letter was written in January last, and is just published.

The St. John's papers of the 29th give details of disasters by the fire that has been raging for several days in the woods in the vicinity of Bathurst and Frederickton. In the former town, three or four dwellings, with their outhouses, had been consumed. At Frederickton, the farmhouse, barns, and all the valuable live stock of Mr. John Reid, were burnt.

Albert Barnes is likely to be laid aside from preaching for some time, in consequence of the failure of his eyes. He has probably strained them beyond their powers of endurance by too early matin studies.

An extensive fire has recently taken place on the Blue Mountains in New Jersey, as in the mountainous district in Pike county, Pa. In both places the fires raged several days, and large tracts of woodland were burned over.

There is a book with the dangerous title of "The Pocket Lawyer." We shouldn't like a book with this title much, for we are sure that if we got a lawyer in our pocket, we never should be able to get him out of it.

The County Court of Loudon Co., Va., has ordered the Sheriff to sell for public hire, about one hundred free negroes, who have neglected to pay their taxes. They are to be hired out at not less than ten cents a day, until the debt is liquidated.

The Utica and Schenectady Railroad, seventy-eight miles long, costing for its construction $1,500,000, for fourteen years cleared 18¾ per cent. per annum over the total expenses, besides reimbursing the original cost.

A coal mine has been discovered in Kentucky, which appears to be inexhaustible. The coal burns like gas, imparting great heat. It will as readily ignite as a candle, and the steamboat men use it for torches, instead of pine knots.

The Missouri River is said to be freer from snags and sandbars than for years previous, which is accounted for by the immense masses of ice which run for weeks after the breaking up of the river in the Spring.

There are thirteen persons out of one hundred and ninety residing in one school district in Canterbury, N. H., whose united ages amount to 1094 years, being an average of over 84 each.

Portions of the walls of Quebec having become dilapidated, it has been determined to remove them. In the work of demolition a portion of the wall was found to be so decayed that it fell unexpectedly, killing one man and severely injuring another.

Certain Methodists in Lower Canada have petitioned the Conference not to follow, in the school books of the denomination, Noah Webster's system of spelling, but that of Jesus Christ, according to the New Testament.

The Natchez Free Trader states that Jefferson College, at Washington, in Adams Co., Miss., is about to lay claim to a very valuable property, consisting of twenty acres of ground in the center of the business portion of Mobile.

A petition has been presented to the General Conference of the M. E. Church, praying that the Conference will require all the editors of the Methodist papers to conform to Bible orthography, and not to that of Noah Webster.

The American Sunday-School Union recently acknowledged the receipt of a donation from the Sandwich Islands to aid in the general missionary operations of the "Union" in the United States.

The clip of Western wool this year is estimated to exceed that of 1851 from 10 to 15 per cent. In the State of Ohio alone the clip is now estimated at from 12 to 14,000,000 pounds.

Strawberries have made their appearance in this market, though in small quantities as yet, and at high prices. They are brought from a distance.

MARRIED,

In Alfred, N. Y., May 23, 1852, by H. G. Witter, Esq., Mr. Truman D. Cartwright, of Alfred, to Miss Abigail Knapp, of Benton, Yates Co., N. Y.

DIED,

In New York, Wednesday, May 26th, of pneumonia, Mrs. Caroline B., wife of Dr. J. D. B. Stillman. Mrs. Stillman was the second daughter of Dea. John Maxson of DeRuyter, and was born at Homer, Cortland Co., N. Y., July 29th, 1822. In 1842 she was chosen Preceptress of Alfred Academy, which position she occupied four years. Those who knew her in that relation, will remember the high range and great power of her intellect, and the impressive influence of her mind upon those around her, and particularly upon her pupils; to whom—and they were many—the news of her death will bring deep sorrow. She was a woman whose life had been marked by the exercise of the noblest Christian virtues, as her death was by the highest Christian consolations; and the composure and sublime fortitude with which, calmly relinquishing all the joys of life, and even the scarce-begun happiness of maternity, she passed into the silent land, knit still more closely the ties that bound her to so many hearts, giving us at once a higher hope and a deeper sorrow. Her last words, spoken a short time before her death, were, "Father, teach thy child patience," expressing in brief her inmost character; for patience and a child-like love of the good and beautiful, moulded and directed all her thoughts and actions. To all that have known her, her life must be a perpetual lesson in all that is lovely and of good repute.

At sea, on the 5th of March last, Shurl D. Maxson. He left Berlin, Wis., in November last, for the land of gold, in company with three others, in hope of amassing wealth; but did not live to reach the place of his destination. He died two days out from San Francisco, of dysentery. He was a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Berlin, and was leader of the choir, in which his loss is deeply felt. He leaves a wife and two small children, and numerous friends, to mourn their loss; but they mourn not without hope, since he died in the triumphs of faith. D. E. L.

April 15th, at Plainfield, N. J., Capt. W. Yarnall, formerly of Philadelphia, after a somewhat protracted illness, at the age of 62 years. It appears that his early impressions on the subject of religion were like those of the Society of Friends; and though he never made a profession of Christianity publicly, still it is hoped that he experienced the benefit of that salvation before he was called to depart from the scenes of this life. L. C.

At New Russia, N. Y., May 3, 1852, of consumption, Harriett W. Wise, in full hope of a blessed immortality beyond the grave.

The Central Association.

THE Seventeenth Annual Meeting of the Seventh-day Baptist Central Association will be held with the 1st Church in Verona, Oneida Co., N. Y., commencing on Third-day, June 8, at 10 o'clock A. M.

The Western Association.

THE Seventh-day Baptist Western Association will hold its Sixteenth Annual Meeting with the 1st Church in Genesee, Allegany Co., N. Y., commencing Fifth-day, June 24th. N. V. Hull is appointed to preach the opening discourse; Leman Andrus, alternate.

A Bible Catechism,

FOR SABBATH SCHOOLS AND FAMILIES. Prepared and published by W. B. Gillett, of New Market, N. J. 48 pages. Price, 7 cents per copy, or 84 cents per dozen. May be obtained at the office of the Sabbath Recorder.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of Wm. Dunn & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.
WILLIAM DUNN, A. D. TITSWORTH, Jr.
JOHN D. TITSWORTH, R. M. TITSWORTH.

To Boston via Norwich and Worcester.

THE first-class Sound steamers CONNECTICUT and KNICKERBOCKER leave Pier 18, N. R., foot of Courtland-st., New York, forming the great United States and British Mail Line for Boston, Montreal, Quebec, Lowell, and Nashua, via Norwich and Worcester. Fare to New London $2; to Worcester $3; to Boston $4; to Bellows' Falls, Vt., $5; to Burlington $7; to Rowse's Point $8. Through tickets to Montreal $9 50.

The pier from which this line starts is the most contiguous of any occupied by the Sound Lines, to the Astor House, Irving House, Howard Hotel, Rathbun's Hotel, and the numerous Hotels in Courtland-st. and its vicinity. The passage affords a fine view of the Hudson and East Rivers, and the Route being Inland, avoids the uncomfortable passage round Point Judith, and through Fisher's Island Sound. Passengers can if they prefer, arrive in Boston at an early hour, by the Steamboat Train, or have the privilege of remaining and breakfasting on board the Steamers, and take the early train from Norwich to Boston; thus making the hour of arrival equally accommodated to pleasure and business travel.

Central Railroad of New Jersey.

Spring Arrangements, May 3, 1852.

FOR Clinton and intermediate places, from pier No. 1 North River, by steamboat RED JACKET, at 9 A. M., 1 (freight) and 5 P. M., and connects at Elizabethtown with trains on the New Jersey Railroad, which leave New York from foot of Cortland-st. at 9 A. M., 1 and 5 P. M.

Returning, leave Clinton at 8.15 A. M., 12.30 P. M. White House at 3.15 (freight) and 5.40 and 8.40 A. M., and 1.40 P. M.; Somerville at 4 (freight) and 6.05 and 9.05 A. M., and 2.05 P. M.; Plainfield at 5.10 (freight) and 6.40 and 9.45 A. M., and 2.40 P. M.; Elizabethtown at 7.15 and 10.30 A. M., and 3.15 P. M.

Passengers for Easton, Bethlehem, Allentown, Wilkesbarre, and Maunch Chunk, Pa., and Flemington, N. Germantown, N. J., will take the 9 A. M. train from New York, and on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, for New Hampton, Washington, Belvidere, N. J. Stages leave Somerville daily for Peapack and Pluckamine on the arrival of the 1 P. M. train. All baggage at the risk of the owners, until delivered into the actual possession of the agents of the Company, and checks or receipts given therefor.

New Printing Materials.

NEW Building, No. 29 Beekman street, between Nassau and William streets, near the City Hall, Park, and principal hotels, New York. The undersigned beg respectfully to inform their patrons and the trade, that they have removed to their new building, No 29 Beekman street, between Nassau and William streets. They trust, from the facilities there offered, by every modern improvement, to meet a continuance of liberal support. Fonts of plain Scotch faces, ranging from 100 lbs. to 1,000 lbs. weight, will be kept on hand, as well as a varied assortment of Fancy Letter, and every article necessary for the furnishing of complete printing offices. The subscribers would beg to call the attention of the trade to their metal, which, for durability, has not been surpassed, if equaled, by any foundry in the United States. By a peculiar combination of metals, arrived at from an experience of thirty years, they are enabled to cast type which they feel assured will last one-third longer than that heretofore furnished by any other foundry in the country. In proof of this, they would state, that the last dress of this paper [the New York Herald] lasted upwards of one year, averaging a daily circulation all the year, including Sundays, besides extras, of 35,000 copies; and this on their rotary cylinder presses—thus evidencing conclusively the fact of durability.

The Sabbath Recorder,

Published Weekly.

Terms—$2 00 per Annum, in Advance.

The Sabbath Recorder is devoted to the exposition and vindication of the views and movements of the Seventh-day Baptist Denomination. It aims to promote vital piety and vigorous benevolent action, at the same time that it urges obedience to the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. Its columns are open to the advocacy of all reformatory measures which seem likely to improve the condition of society, diffuse knowledge, reclaim the inebriate, and enfranchise the enslaved. In its Literary and Intelligence Departments, care is taken to furnish matter adapted to the wants and tastes of every class of readers. As a Religious and Family Newspaper, it is intended that the Recorder shall rank among the best.

Miscellaneous.

Earth's Noblemen.

I'm of that band that till the land
And draw from earth her store;
Right happy indeed is the life we lead,
While our days are passing o'er.
Many there are in riches far
Surpassing the farmer's purse,
While other pursuits may yield more fruits,
Yet often produce much worse.

We envy not the statesman's lot,
Still clamoring for his class,
Nor his that fights for glory's rights,
At some redoubted pass.
No risk have we for boisterous sea,
No fears lest tempests whelm
All we possess without redress,
While laboring at the helm.

The fruitful field its bounties yields,
A rich reward for toil;
Be ours the trade to ply the spade,
And deeply plough the soil.
We walk abroad o'er carpet sod,
And flow'rets kiss our feet,
Whose odors rise to scent the skies—
A tribute pure and meet.

To all we give the means to live,
As brother shares with brother,
And thus fulfill the holy will
That bids us love each other!
Oh, life secure from guile, and pure,
To thee, my love, cling ever;
With all its might and fond delight,
To change from thee, no, never!

From an English Paper.

The Rajah of Coorg in England.

The Rajah of Coorg, a principality of Hindostan, on the Western Chauts, arrived on the 5th May, at Southampton. He came over to England to have his daughter educated—a singular and interesting event in the history of the native princes of India. The Rajah ate and drank with the passengers during the voyage. His daughter is an intelligent and interesting child. He was accompanied by Major Drummond as his guide. His servants were six in number. The Rajah and his daughter left Southampton, with Major Drummond and his family, by an early train, on the 6th, to take lodgings at Mivart's Hotel, previous to his taking a private residence. The Rajah and the Major returned to Southampton in the afternoon, and the whole of his family and suit proceeded to London by the 7 P. M. train.

The Rajah's wives left the Euxine steamer, completely veiled, on Monday night at 9 o'clock, and were conveyed to Radley's Hotel in a closed carriage. They were met at the door of the hotel by the Rajah and one of his principal attendants, who both held umbrellas over the heads of the ladies as they alighted. As soon as they alighted they took the umbrellas themselves, and completely screened themselves from view. During the process of their alighting from the carriage, however, a glimpse of one of them was obtained, and it was noticed that the lady had a thin gauze veil over her face, and fine black eyes. The Rajah was exceedingly anxious that no one should observe the ladies, and appeared agitated until they were safely in their apartment. His agitation was so great when he had conducted them up stairs, that he could not open the door of the apartment, and imagining it was locked, he requested that the gas should be extinguished in the passage where they were standing, which was immediately done. The Prince has given up his caste. He is a pensioner of the East India Company, and has been residing at Benares on an allowance of £12,000 a year.

Yesterday the Rajah's six servants, who, by his desire, observed most strictly the rules of their caste, had eight pounds of food allowed them, which consisted of rice, onions, and greens, which they cooked and ate in the open air at the back of the hotel. They eat but one meal a day, and their drink is water. They are in fact Oriental vegetarians and teetotallers. At night they sleep in the passages and under the tables in the hotel. The servants are rigid Hindoos, and among their baggage was a large number of native cooking utensils and a quantity of Eastern food. As soon as they arrived at the hotel, they made preparations for cooking their meal. They wanted to cook by the side of a stream of water, but this they could not be accommodated with. They were very busy in the court-yard of the hotel, in the evening about 6 o'clock, in culinary operations. Previous to lighting their fires, they carefully washed their hands and feet, and then commenced laying out their stores of provisions, which consisted of a number of small bags of rice, by the side of which was a lemon. After lighting their fires with wood and coal, they crouched down and kept them alive by blowing them with their mouths, at the same time stirring vigorously their food, which was simmering in brass pans.

Mohammedanism in Western Africa.

A French resident upon the Cazamance, in Western Africa, states that since 1830 a religious war has been raging, in which the Futa-Djalos, at the instigation of the Mohammedan Mandingoes, have enslaved the heathenish Mandingoes, and intend to extend the area of their Kingdom to the sea. They have sent requisitions of tribute to several European trading-houses in the country. The whole region was appalled at the rumors of their terrible valor. At first the heathenish Mandingoes sought to make a stand against the onset; but they were scattered by the Futa-Djalos, who retain possession of the whole Mandingo country, excepting a few villages near the French fort Sedhiou. Before their arrival, no Mohammdan village was palisaded or defended. The Pagan inhabitants of any district had generally only one or two family names, which were universal. Among the Mohammedan inhabitants, each had his peculiar family name; so that, apparently, the country of the Pagans was inhabited by many families under one head, and did not extend—while the Mohammedan region was recruited by numbers attracted to trade for amulets, &c., of the Mohammedan faith. Thus they increased and extended, and this is the general method of the advance of Mahomet's religion in the interior of Africa. The Futa-Djalos have been long of that faith, and are now masters of all their fellow-believers. They have extended the villages of the true faith, and destroyed those of the heathen. Upon the banks of the San Domingo Rio Gela there are multitudes of Mohammedans, but dependent upon the Sanniqués or Pagans. Yet all the people brought in contact with the Mandingoes, gradually assume their customs and language, and are finally entirely mingled with them. So the nation accumulates its numbers at the expense of the neighboring tribes, and so the faith spreads. It is noticeable that this faith is propagated by avarice and not by a desire of proselytism. The Futa-Djalos were attracted by the hope of plunder, and threatened, unless the orthodox Mandingoes paid heavy tribute, to desert to the heathen. If Mohammedanism has benefited religion here, it is less by any direct influence, than by the advanced civilization which accompanies it. The trading Mandingoes push in among the Pagans wherever they can make a bargain. There they cling, and presently build settlements. Possibly the races now spread along the coast will disappear before the slow but sure advance of civilization, coming from the interior of Africa in the wake of Mohammedanism, unless European Missionaries, who bring to that Western coast the light of Christianity, drive back again into mid Africa the religion of Mahomet. Progress of Railway Speed.

When George Stephenson constructed the first locomotive engine, men who called themselves "practical" contended that the smooth wheels would run round, or slip, on the equally smooth iron rails, without moving the carriage. But the wheels actually did bite, and Mr. Stephenson then said to his friends that there was no limit to the speed of such an engine, provided the works could be made to stand. This was in 1812.

A few years later, a writer who declared himself friendly to the use of locomotive engines, strongly protested against "extravagant expectations, or rather professions, of the enthusiastic speculatist," that "engines would be seen traveling at the rate of 12, 16, 18, and 20 miles an hour," and added, that "nothing could do more harm towards their general adoption and improvement than the promulgation of such nonsense." This was in 1825.

When the Liverpool and Manchester railway bill was introduced, Mr. Stephenson was examined on its merits before a committee of the House of Commons, and the promoters of that project gravely warned him that if he talked of a locomotive going at a greater rate than 10 miles an hour, he would "put a cross on the concern." Even that rate of speed was considered so out of the way, that one person asked if Mr. Stephenson was a foreigner, and another hinted doubts of his sanity. This was in 1828.

The Liverpool and Manchester railway was opened, and a speed of thirty miles an hour was obtained, which rather settled the question of Mr. Stephenson's sanity. This was in 1830.

The other day, on the London and Birmingham, as well as on the Great Western railway, a rate of traveling at the speed of 65 miles an hour was accomplished. The express trains on these lines run at the rate of nearly 50 miles an hour, stoppages included. Mr. Brunel expects that without any risk, the progress of traveling on the Great Western line will arrive at a speed of a mile per minute. We say nothing of the yet greater speed which is promised by the atmospheric mode of locomotion.

Thus, then, about thirty years ago, it was doubted whether locomotives could run at all upon iron railways; twenty years ago, the idea of their moving at a greater speed than ten miles in the hour was scoffed at as chimerical; fifteen years ago, the unexpected rate of thirty miles an hour was considered a wonder which no effort of practical science could surpass; and now a speed of nearly fifty miles an hour is in daily use, while the rate of a mile per minute is promised, and, in some special instances, has actually been exceeded.

It is singular that the three great feats accomplished by practical science in our time, viz:—lighting by gas, crossing the Atlantic by steam in ten days, and rapid traveling by the same motive power on railways, have, one and all, been denounced as utterly impracticable by "philosophers," who actually knew nothing of the subjects upon which they theorized.

As a comment on this article, I notice a statement in the periodical press, that a few days since a train of cars, without passengers, made the run from Poughkeepsie to Peekskill, N. Y., distance thirty-two miles, in thirty minutes. This is the greatest speed, for that entire distance, ever reached, in the United States. [Cist's Advertiser.

Music and Amputation.

A venerable American judge relates the following anecdote:

The morning following the battle of Yorktown, I had the curiosity to attend the dressing of the wounded. Among others whose limbs were so much injured as to require amputation, was a musician, who had received a musket-ball in the knee. As was usual in such cases, preparations were being made to lash him down to the table, to prevent the possibility of his moving. Says the sufferer:

"Now, Doctor, what would you be at?"

"My lad, I am going to take off your leg, and it is necessary that you should be lashed down."

"I'll consent to no such thing. You may pluck the heart from my bosom, but you'll not confine me. Is there a fiddle in the camp? If so, bring it to me."

A violin was furnished, and, after tuning it, he said, "Now, Doctor, begin;" and he continued to play until the operation, which took about forty minutes, was completed, without missing a single note, or moving a muscle.

The Chances of Life.

Among the interesting facts developed by the recent census, are some in relation to the laws that govern life and death. They are based upon returns from the State of Maryland, and a comparison with previous ones. The calculation it is unnecessary to explain, but the result is a table from which we gather the following illustration:—

10,268 infants are born on the same day and enter upon life simultaneously. Of these, 1,243 never reach the anniversary of their birth. 9,025 commence the second year, but the proportion of deaths still continues so great, that at the end of the third only 8,183, or about four-fifths of the original number, survive. But during the fourth year, the system seems to acquire more strength, and the number of deaths rapidly decreases. It goes on decreasing until twenty-one, the commencement of maturity and the period of highest health. 7,134 enter upon the activities and responsibilities of life—more than two-thirds of the original number. Thirty-five come to the meridian of manhood; 6,302 have reached it. Twenty years more, and the ranks are thinned. Only 4,727, or less than half of those who entered life fifty years ago, are left. And now death comes more frequently. Every year the ratio of mortality steadily increases, and at seventy there are not a thousand survivors. A scattered few live on to the close of the century, and at the age of one hundred and six years, the drama is ended. The last man is dead.

Homestead Exemption.

The following extracts exhibit the various qualifications of the Exemption Bills now in force in the several States named:—

Maine.—A lot of land, dwelling house and out buildings thereon, or so much thereof as shall not exceed $500 in value.

Vermont.—The homestead of every housekeeper, or head of a family, to the value of five hundred dollars, and the yearly products thereof.

Massachusetts.—The lot and buildings thereon occupied as a residence, to the value of five hundred dollars.

New York.—The lot and buildings thereon occupied as a residence, to the value of one thousand dollars.

Maryland.—All real estate acquired by marriage during the life of the wife, from execution for debt of husband.

Georgia.—Twenty acres of land, including dwelling house and improvements—value of house and improvements not to exceed two hundred dollars—and the additional amount of five acres for each child under fifteen years of age.

Florida.—Forty acres of land to every farmer, and to every house-keeper residing in a town or city, a house and lot not to exceed three hundred dollars in value.

Alabama.—Forty acres of land, when not in any town or city, and provided such does not exceed in value $400.

Texas.—Two hundred acres of land, when not in any town or city lots, not to exceed in value $2,000

Ohio.—Every family a homestead not exceeding $500 in value.

Michigan.—Forty acres with dwelling house and appurtenances, when not in town or city; if in a town or city, a lot and dwelling house not to exceed in value $1,500.

Illinois.—Lot of ground and buildings thereon occupied as a residence, not exceeding in value $1,000.

Iowa.—Forty acres of land, not in a town or city, or houses and lot in a town or city, not exceeding $500.

Wisconsin.—Forty acres of land, not in a town or city, or a town or city lot not exceeding in amount one-fourth of an acre.

California.—The homestead, consisting of a quantity of land together with the dwelling house thereon and its appurtenances and not exceeding in value the sum of $5,000.

New Jersey.—A homestead to each head of a family, being the family residence, to the value of $500; not to be assets in the hands of an Administrator, but to remain for the benefit of the widow, and until the maturity of the last minor child.

South Carolina.—A homestead of fifty acres of land, including the dwelling house and appurtenances, not to exceed $500 in value; and not to extend to any property situated within the limits of any city or town corporate.

Treatment of Deafness.

One of the latest efforts to restore to a deaf ear its original functions, consists in applying a cup that fits closely to the side of the head, round the outer ear, and exhausting it with an air pump, A common cupping apparatus answers every purpose, provided the glass will fit so well as to prevent the ingress of atmospheric air under the edge. In a variety of cases, the siple process of carrying on this exhaustion till a new sensation is felt, something like extreme tension in the lining membrane of the meatus externus, is represented to restore the organ to its normal state. Under such circumstances the theory of the remedy is, that deafness results from an impoverished flow of cerumen, in consequence of the inertia of the excretory ducts, and by taking off the atmospheric pressure, their proper fluid oozes out upon the tube and instantly modifies the condition of the mechanism, exterior to the drum. Having thus been roused from a state of torpor and suspended activity, they continue afterwards to act with energy. If they subsequently fall partially back to their abnormal condition, the pump must be re-applied, as occasion may suggest. As there is no witchcraft about it, and almost every practitioner has a breast-pump or similar contrivance, by which an experiment could be made, and there being no hazard attending it, it may be worth a trial, and it is very possible that one out of a dozen cases might be essentially benefited by this simple operation.

"One Idea."

"Professor C. often laughs at me," said an eminent man of science once, "because I have but one idea. He reads every thing, and talks about every thing, but I have learned that, if I ever make a breach, I must aim my guns continually at one point." And he gained his reward. He gave his days and nights to physical science. When he was an obscure country teacher, he pored over "Silliman's Journal" by the light of a pine knot fire in a log cabin. A few years later, he was dining with English dukes and earls, and received as one of the "lions" at the British Association for the Advancement of Science. He is now at the head of a great scientific institution, and his name is a part of our national jewelry.

His history is substantially the history of nearly every person who has "made his mark" on the time in which he lived. Those who have filled the largest space in the eyes of the world, and have achieved the most signal results, have been actuated by some master feeling, and this passion of the soul has subordinated every thing else to itself. Their capacious souls contrived many ideas, but a single aim directed, and employed, and animated them all. Kossuth is a man of one idea. He lives, and dreams, and thinks, and speaks, for Hungary and her rights. This is the secret of his eloquence. He converts others to his views, because he has so fully converted himself. He kindles others by the intense blaze of his own enthusiasm. So did Peter the Hermit. So did Luther. Wilberforce aroused the English Parliament and nation to deeds of philanthropy, by standing up for thirty long years a sublime and undaunted witness against the bloody wrongs of Africa. These men played their artillery upon one given point until they "made the breach."

MAZZINI ON SOCIALISM.—Mazzini, in his famous attack on socialism, published in the Nation, a Belgian paper, says, among other things, the following:—

"I tax them with having repeated with Bentham and Volney, life is a search after happiness—instead of repeating with all those who have effected great transformations in the world, life is a mission, it is the fulfillment of a duty. I tax them with having allowed the belief that a people is to be regenerated by fattening it—with having turned the question of humanity into a question of the kitchen of humanity—with having said, 'to every man according to his wants, and his power of enjoyment,' instead of, 'to every man according to his love and the intensity of his self-expenditure. I tax them with having, by I know not what inactive cosmopolitism, by I know not what establishment of headless communes, enfeebled, obliterated as far as in them lay the national sentiment. As well might the lever act without its fulcrum, or the human body be made strong by dislocating its organs."

HOW TO GET SLEEP.—How to get sleep is to some persons a matter of high importance. Nervous persons, who are troubled with wakefulness and excitability, usually have a strong tendency of blood on the brain with cold extremities. The pressure of the blood on the brain keeps it in a stimulated or wakeful state, and the pulsations in the head are often painful. Let such rise and chafe the body and extremities with a brush or towel, or rub smartly with the hands to promote circulation and withdraw the excessive amount of blood from the brain, and they will fall asleep in a few moments. A cold bath, or a sponge bath and rubbing, or a good run, or a rapid walk in the open air, or going up and down stairs a few times, just before retiring, will aid in equalizing circulation and promoting sleep. These rules are simple and easy of application in castle or cabin, and may minister to the comfort of thousands who would freely expend money for an anodyne to promote "Nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep." [Scien. Amer.

EXTRAORDINARY COOPERAGE.—The application of science to the increased production of articles necessary for commerce, has rarely been exhibited in a more striking way than by the patented invention for constructing casks, barrels, puncheons, and every thing in the cooperage line, in a space of time which literally baffles belief. One of the machines is in operation at the St. Rollox Works, Scotland. An on-looker must be astonished to find the staves of an ordinary sized cask prepared, put together, and headed in little more than ten minutes. The thing is perfect—the cutting and joining is done with mathematical precision, and all the hands have to do is to arrange the staves and fix the heads; all the rest is accomplished by machinery, and with so little trouble, that the article is finished before one could fancy that a hoop was on. The mechanism, like that of most important inventions, is exceedingly simple.

A PILL FOR A DUELIST.—An apothecary having refused to resign his seat at a theater to an officer, who, feeling himself much insulted, sent him a challenge.

The apothecary was punctual at the meeting, but observed, that not having been accustomed to shoot, he had to propose a new way of settling the dispute. He then drew from his pocket a small box, and taking from thence two pills, thus addressed his antagonist:

"As a man of honor, sir, you certainly would not wish to fight me on unequal terms; here are, therefore, two pills; one composed of the most deadly poison, the other perfectly harmless; we are, therefore, on equal ground, if we each swallow one; you shall take your choice; and I promise faithfully to take that which you leave."

It is needless to add that the affair was settled by a hearty laugh.

A CROOKED CANAL, AND THE REASON.—The Canal from Afteh towards Cairo, in Egypt, is very crooked, and the reason for it was thus explained by Mehemet Ali himself:—

"You ask why my canal is not straight. Ya, Wallah! it is owing to a bit of bigotry. The dog who made it was a true believer, and something more. He said to himself, Ya, Seede, thou art about to make what Giaours call a canal, and Giaours in their impiety made such things straight. Now, a canal is made after the fashion of a river, (Allah pardon us for imitating his works!) and all rivers wind. Allah forbid that my canal should be better than his river; it shall wind, too. And so it does."

STRENGTH OF A WOMAN.—The Rev. Ephraim Judson, a clergyman in Norwich City, Conn., in 1771, was an exceedingly quaint and original preacher. Remarking at one time upon the excuses made by the guests invited to the wedding feast, he observed, that the one who had bought five yoke of oxen simply entreated to be excused, while the one who married a wife absolutely declared that he could not come. 'Hence learn,' said the preacher, 'that one woman can pull harder than five yoke of oxen.'

"A bad example, though it operates fatally, operates comparatively within a small circumference. It extends only to those who are near enough to observe it, and fall within the reach of the poisonous infection that spreads around it; but the contagion of a licentious publication, especially if it be in a popular and captivating shape, knows no bounds; it flies to the remotest corners of the earth; it makes its way into the cottage of the peasant and the shop of the mechanic; it falls into the hands of all ages, ranks, and conditions."

A friend, just arrived from a trip up the Missouri as high as St. Joseph, says the Cincinnati Enquirer, represents that the whole country is like an extended encampment. In and around every town, the vacant grounds are whitened with tents, and alive with the mass of men, women, children, horses, and cattle, all preparing for the start upon that long journey over plain, mountain, and desert, which has to be performed to reach the land of golden hopes and golden disappointments.

The Troy Whig says that the stages which arrived in that city on Friday, May 14, from Bellows Falls, Vermont, came sixteen miles of the route on "runners," and it was the opinion of the driver that he should continue to do so at least two weeks longer.

VARIETY.

The only way by which capital can increase, is by saving. If you spend as much as you get, you will never be richer than what you are. 'Tis not what a man gets, but what he saves, constitutes wealth. Wealth is not acquired, as many suppose, by fortunate speculations and splendid enterprises, but by the daily practice of industry, frugality, and economy. He who relies on the means, will rarely be found destitute, and he who relies upon any other, will generally become bankrupt.

The rogues of France can remove one side of a silver coin with a very fine thin saw, cut out the silver in the middle, fill up with baser metal, solder on the surface again, and leave the piece looking as before. Most of the pieces thus altered bear the effigy either of Louis XVIII., Charles X., or Louis Phillippe. The fraud was first detected at the Bank of France. The deterioration of the coin thus altered is about seven-tenths.

Some attention has been excited by the alledged discovery, by a French engineer of some celebrity, named Andraud, of some means of seeing the air. If, says he, you take a piece of card, colored black, of the size of the eye, and pierce with a fine needle a hole in the middle, you will, on looking through that hole, at a clear sky, or a lighted lamp, see a multitude of molecules floating about, which molecules constitute the air.

A vessel arrived lately at Portsmouth, England, on board of which was a plank which is stated to exceed in size any piece of wood yet cut. It was intended for the World's Fair, but it was too late for the purpose, no vessel being with reach which could accommodate it. This plank is 248 feet long, 22 inches broad and 6 inches in thickness.

The Lawrenceburgh Press states that Dr. J. G. Dunn, of that city, has discovered a chemical combination by which he can charge the surface of any kind of stone or brick so as to represent the most beautiful and substantial marble or granite. It is simply a process for crystalizing lime, and is capable of being colored or mottled by any tint whatever.

The Vermont State Journal says to farmers If you would make a good bargain with mother earth, give her a plenty of seed. If you scrimp her, you cheat yourself and cheat your earth, and are guilty of double dishonesty. If you undertake to save five dollars in seed, you will lose twenty dollars in hay and pasture.

Gen. Gorgey, the betrayer of Hungary, has beguiled his solitary confinement in the Tyrol, by writing an apology for himself and his actions during the revolutionary struggle. The work is in press, and pretty nearly ready for publication. The title is "My Life and Acts in 1848-9." It is looked for with immense interest.

DeRuyter Institute.

THE Academic Year commences the last Wednesday in August, and closes the last Tuesday in June of each year.

Board of Instruction.

Rev. J. R. IRISH, A. M., Principal.
Miss JOSEPHINE WILCOX, Preceptress
Rev. J. W. MORTON, } Assistants.
Mr. O. B. IRISH, }

The Terms for 1851 and 1852 are as follows:—
The First commences Aug. 27 and closes Dec. 2.
" Second " Dec. 3 " " March 16.
" Third " March 17 " " June 29.

There will be no vacation between the Terms, but there will be a recess of one week at the middle of the Second Term, and, at the option of the school, one of two days near the middle of each of the other Terms.

In the common branches, and a few others, classes will be formed at the commencement of each Term, but in the higher branches a different arrangement is necessary. Hence Chemistry, Physiology, and Intellectual Philosophy, are assigned to the Fall Term; Philosophy, Astronomy, and Logic, to the Winter Term; and Botany, Geology, and Moral Science, to the Spring Term. Latin, German, and French are commenced in the Fall Term, Greek and Hebrew in the Winter, and Spanish and Italian in the Spring, and continued through the course. Geometry is commenced with the Fall Term, Trigonometry and Conic Sections in the Winter, Mathematical Astronomy, Surveying, and Navigation in the Spring.

Tuition.

Tuition should be arranged before entering classes.

Geography. Elementary Arithmetic, and Beginners in Grammar, per Term,	$3 00
Higher Arithmetic, Advanced Grammar, Composition, Beginners in Algebra, and Analysis,	$4 00
Higher Mathematics, Languages, Natural Sciences, &c.	$5 00

EXTRAS.

Chemical Experiments,	$1 00
Drawing,	1 00
Monochromatic Painting	3 00
Oil Painting,	5 00
Writing and Stationery,	0 50
Vocal Music, Elementary,	1 00
Advanced Class,	2 00
Instrumental Music,	8 00

Use of Organ or Piano, $2 00 per quarter.

BOARD, in private families, per week, from $1 25 to $1 50; in clubs, from 60 to 90 cents.

Teachers' Classes will be formed at the opening of the Fall Term, and at the middle of the Winter Term, and continue seven weeks. The course will embrace a thorough review of the common school branches, with daily lectures on "The Art of Teaching," Chemistry, Physiology, Laws of Health, School Laws, &c., &c. Tuition $2 50.

Students should not be furnished with unnecessary pocket-money, neither should minors be allowed to contract debts in the village. Either member of the Faculty will superintend the financial affairs of pupils placed under their care, by special direction from parents and guardians, if funds are furnished in advance.

The Society has also published the following works, to which attention is invited:—

A Defense of the Sabbath, in reply to Ward on the Fourth Commandment. By George Carlow. First printed in London, in 1724; reprinted at Stonington, Ct., in 1802; now republished in a revised form. 168 pp.
The Royal Law Contended for. By Edward Stennet. First printed in London, in 1658. 60 pp.
Vindication of the True Sabbath, by J. W. Morton, late Missionary of the Reformed Presbyterian Church. 64 pp.
Also, a periodical sheet, quarto, The Sabbath Vindicator. Price $1 00 per hundred.

The series of fifteen tracts, together with Edward Stennett's "Royal Law Contended for," and J. W. Morton's "Vindication of the True Sabbath," may be had in a bound volume.

These tracts will be furnished to those wishing them for distribution or sale, at the rate of 15 pages for one cent. Persons desiring them can have them forwarded by mail or otherwise, on sending their address, with a remittance, to GEORGE B. UTTER, Corresponding Secretary of the American Sabbath Tract Society, No. 9 Spruce-st., New York.

THE NEIGHBORHOOD OF SHANGHAE.

Copied for the Recorder from the North China Herald.

Some of the pleasantest walks in this neighborhood lie on the west side of the city. Within the walls, the embankment against which they are built, forms a dry path, when many of the country roads are impassable; and that portion of it from the north gate, past the small parade ground, by the west to the south gate, is literally rus in urbe. Keeping outside the walls, and proceeding towards the pagoda, we reach St. Catharine's bridge, which, in an artistic point of view, is about the only pretty place in the whole district. At full tide, and when the the lofty trees in the adjoining plantations are in their best foliage, the scenes here are well worthy of the pencil of the most accomplished painter.* There is a capital riding road the whole way from this bridge to the French Missionary Establishment at Ze-ka-wey. Along the bank of the Poo-way-dong creek, the land is high, and a more extended view of the country around is obtained from this road than any other in the neighborhood. This, too, is one of the best roads after wet weather, its elevated position exposing it to the drying influences of the winds.

We were once fortunate enough to be admitted into the studio of the accomplished priest at Ze-ka-wey, whose chief employment is to model images to adorn the chapels and the new Cathedral; the models, though only in clay, were perfect works of art; one in particular, the dead Christ, supported by the Virgin, was superb, the pure, languid, utterly dead look of the body, was still without that rigidity which it is so difficult to avoid, especially in sculpture, when an inanimate subject is treated. There was an imploring, trustful look in the Virgin's face, not unmixed with an expression of the deepest sorrow, that stamps the model as the work of one highly advanced in the art. The group is pyramidical, the form most to be admired in all sculpture; witness "Bailey's Graces," "Eve at the Fountain," "The Dying Gladiator," &c. &c. The Amazon in the Exhibition is also in this category. In the Chapel, which is a large building, we believe there are some finished works by the same artist. One, "Christ in the Tomb," is highly spoken of. At the back of the building are extensive school-rooms. The scholars seem to be very happy, and well taken care of. Their sleeping apartments are remarkable for their neat and cleanly appearance, each scholar being provided with a comfortable bed, which is furnished with musqueto curtains. Part of the garden is devoted to the growth of plants used for medicines.

About a mile to the north-west of Ze-ka-wey is the town of Fat-wha, which consists of one long street running in a westerly direction. Through this, is one of the roads to Yah-ke-tun, or Pheasant Mound, a small hill about eleven miles from Shanghae, situated on the Soo-choo creek, where the stream branches off that leads to Kea-ding, an insignificant city, where the bricks in its walls exceed those in its houses. However, the Chief Magistrate's house is rather imposing, on account of a fine stone railing in front, and is well situated on the margin of a small lake, in the center of which is a wooded islet. The city walls seem to be about equal in circumference to those of Shanghae. There is a pagoda in the city, but it is in a very bad state of repair. An insurance office would almost be justified in disputing a claim if any accident happened to one of its clients adventurous enough to ascend it. The manner of getting up is rather singular. Upon reaching one story, you have to go out into the balcony and walk half round it, then enter by a few steps into the next, and so on. The danger lies in coming down the steps on each story, as they are very steep. If a false step is taken, the railing of the balcony would be found too weak to break the fall.

Between Ya-ke-tun and Kea-ding a considerable quantity of a kind of indigo is grown. The lime pits used for extracting the color may be seen at intervals along the banks of the creek. There is a village called Nan-tsun, on this creek, famous for the dragon boats brought there at one of the native festivals. "The hills" are visible from Yah-ke-tun. It may be useful to give the names of these hills, which are as follows: The Pagoda Hill, Cho-san; the hill between it and Leang Pagoda Hill, is Chin-san; this is generally called Joss-house Hill by foreigners, on account of the number of the Joss-houses on the south side of it. The Leang Pagoda Hill to the south, called Rob Roy's Hill from its rugged and precipitous sides, is Wang-san. The first of the lakes to the west of the hills is the Mao-hoo. On an island in them is a pagoda called the Mao-tow. In this neighborhood boats with the fishing cormorants are sometimes seen. It is certainly very interesting to see the complete command the men have over these birds; and not the least extraordinary thing, is to see the way the men venture in so small boats across the lakes, when there is a sea on; the waves appear large enough to swamp much larger craft; in fact, we must confess we were sick of them.

There is a style of fishing sometimes employed in the Soo-choo creek, which we have not previously seen described; the fisherman sits at one end of a long canoe-looking boat, which has a board painted white out level with the water on the laboard side. This attracts the fish on moonlight nights, so that they jump upon it, or over into the boat, and to prevent their jumping too far, there is a net rigged up perpendicularly on the starboard side.

Among the objects of interest near Shanghae, that are within walking distance, perhaps the bubbling well is the most curious. The carbonic acid gas that it discharges itself of is easily ignited when flame is applied. A small quantity could be readily obtained by filling a bottle with water, inserting a funnel into it, then placing them over one of the jets, the mouth of the funnel being completely immersed in the well; the gas will then rise and displace the water in the bottle, which, when full of gas, must be carefully corked. About a mile north of the bubbling well is a fine grave, with a short avenue in front; there are evident signs of great care being taken to keep this grave and the trees surrounding it in a good state of preservation. Some very handsome flowers have sometimes been obtained here.

The baby-towers in this neighborhood are worthy of remark, both on account of the singular mode of burial employed, and the inquiries into infanticide to which they naturally lead. There is one near the French Consulate, and another at St. Catharine's bridge. We sincerely hope there are no more, as they give strong grounds for suspecting that all the children deposited in them may not have died a natural death. However, we believe that infanticide is far from being a common crime in this district. During the famine in 1849, the tower was crammed to the top with bodies. They are generally wrapped in matting. It requires a considerable amount of curiosity to climb up to one of the arches, through which the dead infants are thrust, and undergo the penalties of looking down into this horrid charnel house.

While on this subject, we may point out some Christian's tombs at the south-west side of the city. They are probably the tombs of Catholic priests, as they have the cross and I. H. S. on them. There is a lengthy Chinese inscription on each. A translation of some of the oldest would be interesting, perhaps, as they all appear to be dated. A few angels or cherubs have been attempted to be carved on one or two.

At the south end of the city, some distance outside the walls, are several cemeteries. One is allotted, we believe, to the Roman Catholics, and among the others there is one appropriated to beggars; the latter is almost impassable in hot weather.

The Catholic Cathedral at Ta-pi-ka, is perhaps the most massive building in China; the thickness of its walls, and great circumference of its pillars, may prove to be too much for its foundation, situated as it is so close to the river. The building is about 240 feet long and 150 feet broad, and is very high; the roof is almost completed. When the whole is finished, it will doubtless be tastefully fitted up, and attract many natives, who, from casual visitors may become converts.

It is in schools and in rural hamlets where the first seeds of the Gospel should be sown in this country, to reap the quickest harvest. But this is not the place to discuss these matters. We would, however, point out the incalculable good a worthy missionary might do to the sick and needy, if he resided in some small village, where, in a very short time, he would be likely to become to the villagers, what a country pastor is to his flock in England, and be equally respected.

One of the most complete changes of scene that can be had in this immediate neighborhood, is obtainable by walking eastward to the banks of the Yang-tsze-kiang. The shortest way is to go by boat to the batteries half way to Woosung, land at the creek Tung-kow (on the right bank of the river,) keep along its margin, or as near it as the road will allow, for about half a mile; then strike off to the left, due east, and in about two miles walk the town of Kow-kow is reached; pass directly through it, and continuing eastward for about four miles more, you will arrive at the great embankment of Yang-tsze-kiang, after having passed over the lesser one. The view from it is quite marine; the waves rolling in over the long beech in interminable succession, the vast flocks of wild fowl passing to and fro in extended lines, and the wide space of unbroken horizon, have a strange newness in their look, that will repay one for the long walk through an uninteresting country. There is a freshness in the breeze, too, that gives additional charms to the scene, and perhaps some outward or homeward bound vessels passing at the time will enliven the view.

The best view of the general features of this country is obtained from the top of Lung-wha Pagoda; and at the temples adjoining a great variety of Chinese gods may be seen. A very extensive view also is that from the top of one of the towers in Kung-wan, the half-way tower to Woosung. The tower is built over a large pawnbroking establishment, and is used as a sort of alarm station in case of fire or thieves. In the highest story there is a large drum, also some bows and arrows, and a rusty matchlock.

THREE MILLIONAIRES.

A New Orleans paper of standing has some curious commentaries on the lives of several rich men recently deceased in that city. Of John McDonogh it thus speaks:

"He had but two passions—notoriety and accumulation. These he pursued through a long, niggardly, and sinful life, and these he exhibited in his will. He clutched at his bonds, and titles, and money bags, in his dying moments; and by a will both silly and intricate, and fruitful of fraud and controversy—a mirror of his character—he sought to control and administer them after death. He cut his neglected relations off with a shilling, and bequeathed the enormus aggregate of seventy years of avarice and cunning, to communities that will never plant a flower on his grave, or moisten it with a tear."

Here is a sketch of another:

"Joseph Fowler was a cold, selfish, cynical, vulgar man, without a scintilla of soul, who lived for himself alone, thinking neither of his suffering kindred in this world, nor of God and eternity. He was the slave of the almighty dollar all his life, and died, at last, without having the courage to make a will; or the grace to make, by public charities, some reparation for the selfishness of his life. His relations, who vainly, in his lifetime, implored the crumbs that 'fell from the rich man's table,' will now, it is hoped, receive and enjoy the magnificent estate which he accumulated by extortion, and coined out of tears and destitution."

The third is referred to as follows:

"Cornelius Paulding was a better man than either of these. He was frigid, penurious, and exacting. But he sometimes gave, and gave freely. For many years he had been a member of the Baptist church; and at various periods, after he removed to New Orleans, he provided a place of worship for his brethren, and tendered his house as a residence for the minister. Several clergymen came to reside with him, but, notwithstanding their habits of self-denial, he starved them all out. Nor did the Church thrive any better under his auspices. The church government of the Baptists is a pure democracy. All the power resides in the members, and even the old prejudice that exclude women from participation in government, is not recognized. All are equals; and the minister in that church, out of the pulpit, has no more power than one of his flock. This form of government was not adapted to the disposition of Mr. Paulding. He was arbitrary and dictatorial, and the result was, that the Baptists in this city, though few in number and poor, preferred to worship in obscure places, rather than to occupy the splendid church which he sometimes proposed to erect for them. Mr. Paulding lived long enough to learn a useful lesson from the death of John McDonogh. He read the commentaries of the press upon his unnatural, selfish, and litigious will. He has wisely bequeathed the bulk of his estate to his impoverished relations; has made generous donations to the Orphan Asylum and Public Schools; and, we rejoice to learn, appropriated $30,000 for the Baptists of this city.

Selected for the Sabbath Recorder.

THE UNIVERSAL OBLIGATION OF THE SABBATH.

Occasional remarks dropped from the lips of professed Christians, taken in connection with their practices, have led us to conclude that the impression has become quite prevalent in the Church, that the obligation to remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy, is very different from that of the law which forbids us to steal our neighbor's property or to take his life. The charge of a violation of the fourth commandment, brought against a professed Christian, would much less seriously affect his standing in society, than the charge that he had stolen his neighbor's goods or taken his life. And yet the same law that forbids the one class of acts enjoins the other. Church discipline for violations of the fourth commandment, unless they are of the most flagrant character, is an almost unheard-of thing; and yet the members of our churches are constantly guilty of such violations. There must lie at the base of this state of public opinion a lurking impression that the rigors of God's law in reference to the observance of the Sabbath have been somewhat abated under the New Testament economy—that He is not as much provoked by a violation of the fourth commandment by Christians as He was at such violations by his ancient people, the Jews. Indeed, we have not unfrequently heard the assertion made, that the Sabbath was a mere Jewish ordinance, and that it passed away with the other rites and ceremonies peculiar to the Old Testament economy. We admit that the temporal penalties annexed to the law under the theocracy are not annexed to it now, but the same remark may be made of most of the other parts of the Decalogue. The penalties of a law may be changed, without in the slightest degree affecting the obligation of the law itself. The law and its penalties are two entirely separate and distinct things. Were any one of the States of this Republic to substitute imprisonment for life in the place of hanging, as a punishment for murder, that fact would not abrogate the law against murder, or imply that it was a less heinous crime to commit murder after the change than it had been before. So we argue, that the temporal penalties, which were annexed to the fourth commandment under the theocracy, and which were executed upon the Jews with such fearful vengeance, are no longer annexed to it, does not in the slightest degree prove that it is a less heinous sin in the sight of God in a Christian to violate that law than it formerly was in a Jew. The Sabbath, though possessed by the Jews, was not peculiar to them, any more than the command not to have any other God but Jehovah was peculiar to them. In proof of this position, we remark, in the first place—

That the objects which God had in view in establishing the Sabbath, applied as fully to other men as they did to the Jews. These objects were to commemorate the act of creation, and to afford a season of rest and relaxation from labor, and for meditation and reflection on the great subject of religion. There is nothing in either of these that made the appointment of such a day more applicable to the Jews than to other nations. Others were as much bound to commemorate the act of creation as they were, because God was equally the creator and preserver of all men. Others needed a day of rest and relaxation from the weary and exhausting toils of life as much as they did. The constitution of both man and beast is such as to require some such season of relaxation, or it sinks speedily from sheer exhaustion. Hence those nations, which have not the Christian Sabbath, have been compelled to appoint some substitute in its place. They could not get along without it. Human nature demands it, and not merely the Jews. All the reasons which God assigned for the appointment of the day are applicable to human nature, and not to any one part of it more than to another.

We remark, secondly, that the time when the Sabbath was instituted, and the person to whom it was given, show that it was intended for the whole race. The sacred narrative states that "on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made, and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made, and God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it." His resting was not to recruit his exhausted energies, which had been expended in the work of creation, but to set his creatures an example, to institute an ordinance for them. We stop not now to answer the quibble of Dr. Paley, and others after him, that the day was not instituted at the end of creation. We take it for granted, for that appears to us to be the plain meaning of the history, that it was given to Adam in a state of innocency, when he stood as the representative of his whole race, and that in that capacity he received it for the race, and not merely for himself. If this be so, it follows that it cannot be a mere Jewish ordinance, because it was given two thousand years before the Jews had an existence as a separate nation. The language of the fourth commandment implies this—Remember the Sabbath to keep it holy; not, I now appoint such a day, and enjoin you to observe it, but remember a day that you have already been taught to observe. Most of the commands which were given to Adam, were given to him in his public capacity, and not as a private individual. The commands to multiply and replenish the earth, and to exercise dominion over the creatures, were all of this character. He represented not the Jews merely, but all the race, and as such he received the law of the Sabbath for the race; hence we conclude that it is binding upon all whom he there represented.

In the third place, we argue the universal obligation of the Sabbath from the position of the law, enjoining it, in the Decalogue. There was a portion of the laws of Moses which was given to him by the voice of God, and he was directed to write them in a book for the benefit of his nation. There was another part that was given amid the terrible thunderings and lightnings of Mt. Sinai, which was written by God himself, not upon parchment, as were the other laws, but upon two tables of stone hewn out of the solid rock. Why this marked difference in the two sets of laws? Why did God write one on stone twice with his own hand, and direct the other to be written by Moses on parchment? It seems clearly to have been implied that the one code of laws was perpetual in its obligation, like the stone upon which it was written, never to decay; the other was intended to crumble like the parchment which contained it, and give place to a more glorious dispensation. Now, that code which was engraven upon the stone contains the law of the Sabbath. All the other laws grouped with it are universally admitted to be binding upon all men, in all ages and countries. They bind the Christian as much as they did the Jew. What right has any man to single out the fourth commandment, and say that it alone, of all the code, has been abrogated. It was written upon the stone by God's own hand as well as they; it was sanctioned by the thunders and lightnings of Sinai as well as they; there is no command of the New Testament repealing it any more than the others. The same God, under the same circumstances, and with the same sanctions, said, Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy, that said thou shalt not kill. If the Sabbath was a mere ceremonial observance, confined to the Jews, why was the law enjoining it singled out from all the other ceremonial observances, and placed among the moral precepts? This was giving it a strange pre-eminence above the others, especially when we remember that near two-thirds of the temporal judgments which were sent upon the Jews were sent upon them for the violation of this law.

A fourth argument for the perpetual obligation of the Sabbath may be derived from those prophecies of the Old Testament which predict its observance under the new dispensation. There are several passages of this character, to only one of which we have room now to refer—it is found in the 56th chapter of Isaiah, and 6th, 7th, and 8th verses—"Also the sons of the strangers that join themselves to the Lord to serve him, and to love the name of the Lord, every one that keepeth the Sabbath from polluting it, will I bring to my holy mountain and make them joyful in my house of prayer." A reference to the context will show that it is the bringing in of the Gentiles into the Christian Church that is here referred to, and that the Sabbath was then still to be observed, and a blessing is promised to him who kept it from polluting it. Of course it follows that Christians would not keep a law that had been abrogated, nor would God bless them for so doing.

The only other argument for the perpetual obligation of the Sabbath which we shall now give, is the fact that we now have as much need of such a day as the Jews had. All of God's laws which have been repealed were in their very nature temporary. The reasons for their continuance ceased, and hence they ceased with them. An unchangeable God would never abolish a law, when all the reason for its original enactment were still in existence. Now, no man can give a reason for a Sabbath before the coming of Christ, which does not still prove the necessity for such a day since that coming. The Sabbath was a type, it is true, but not of any thing under the new dispensation, but of the rest of heaven, and that is as much needed now as it was under the old economy. If such a day were useful to the Jews, it will be equally useful to Christians. If the failure to observe it brought down God's displeasure upon the Jews, it will be equally displeasing to him in Christians. We conclude, therefore, that the fourth is just as obligatory upon Christians as any of the other nine commandments of the Decalogue, and that he who violates it is really as great a sinner in the sight of God, and as worthy of the censures of the church and the exercise of its discipline as he who steals or bears false witness against his neighbor or covet his neighbor's goods. Church Sessions and Judicatories ought to wake up and bring the powers intrusted to them to bear upon the public mind, to check the growing desecration of the day by church members.

THE TWO SISTERS.

Awake! awake! the royal hills
Are diademed with rosy light,
The waving forests, warbling rills,
All worship God aright.

Where trees like emerald pillars rise,
A child is kneeling on the sod,
Her face is looking on the skies,
Her heart is gone to God.

Her prayer is said, she rises now,
She seeks the dear familiar bower,
Shadowed by many a leafy bough,
Perfumed by many a flower.

With fingers pale the bridal vine
Still clasps her forest lord, and strays,
Where warm voluptuous sunbeams shine,
A thousand various ways;

Or hangs the curtain that she weaves
In folds before that temple fair;
A lovely tapestry of leaves,
That stirs with every air.

The child approached the lone retreat,
With quickened steps and eager eye;
She called—Awake! O sister, sweet!
But there was no reply.

She drew the leafy veil apart,
She looked above, but nothing said,
And entering with a beating heart,
She stood before the Dead.

Alone and with the Dead she stood,
The Dead, asleep among the flowers,
That yesternight her hand had strewed,
Marked not the changing hours.

She knew not it was morning prime,
Shall never know the silent noon,
Shall never heed the twilight time,
Nor chronicle the moon.

A broken lilly in her hand,
A drooping rose on drooping head;
Even Nature seemed to understand
Her queenliest flower lay dead.

The Child, with aspect sad and still,
Stood gazing at her sister's side,
Content, if it had been God's will,
That moment to have died.

She felt like Eve when Eden's gate
Had closed on her for evermore,
She felt that life was desolate,
That Paradise was o'er.

No tears are hers, for tears are vain,
The heart and not the robe is rent,
If God who gives will take again,
'Tis folly to lament.

Then drop the curtain, fold by fold,
Over the consecrated Bower,
And veil from curious eyes and cold
The dead and living Flower. [Lon. Leader.

ISAAC T. HOPPER.

The Anti-Slavery Standard has a sketch of the life of Isaac T. Hopper, prepared by L. Maria Child, from which we copy several paragraphs of general interest:—

"When he was a lad, eleven or twelve years old, he happened to see an old colored man sitting on the fence, watching him, with a very dejected countenance. He went up to him, and inquired why he seemed so sad. 'Ah,' said the old man, 'I was thinking of the time when I was a boy, like you, before the white men came and carried me off into slavery. See how my hands were torn by clinging to bushes, brambles, and rocks, as they dragged me along!' He held out his hard hands, which still showed the scars left by deep wounds in that desperate struggle. Isaac sat down beside him, and listened to the details of a story, which filled his young heart with generous indignation. As he walked thoughtfully away, he made an inward vow that, from that time, through his whole life, he would be the friend of Africans; and faithfully he kept this juvenile resolution. He was one of the very earliest friends of the slaves, and, to his latest hour, he warmly sympathized with their wrongs. He was a prominent member of the first Abolition Society in Pennsylvania, and labored earnestly with Benjamin Rush, Dr. Rogers, and other distinguished philanthropists of the time. No man at that period, not even eminent judges and advocates, was better acquainted with all the intricacies of law questions connected with Slavery. His accurate legal knowledge, his natural acuteness, his ready tact in avoiding dangerous corners, and slipping through unseen loop-holes, often gave him the victory in cases that seemed hopeless to other minds. On many of these occasions, physical courage was needed as much as moral firmness; but Friend Hopper possessed both these qualities in remarkable degree. When a loaded pistol was pointed at his breast, he looked the slave-hunter steadily in the eye, and said calmly, 'Foolish man, put up that murderous weapon! Dost thou expect to terrify me from my duty?' Once he was thrown out of a second story window, by two or three enraged men, who were binding a slave with cords; but he re-appeared in the the room, through another second story window, a few minutes after, and rescued their victim by simple boldness and presence of mind.

After his removal from Philadelphia, fewer cases of this kind were brought under his observation. Systematic arrangements to aid 'fugitives from injustice' had become more common; and even among those who talked loudest against Abolitionists, there was an increasing tendency to ask no questions when they saw a colored man in a hurry to step Northward. But though Friend Hopper's zeal and energy were less needed in slave cases in his later years, he was always ready and active when called upon. Not many months before his decease, he left his bed at midnight to place a poor fugitive in safety; and had the step involved imprisonment during the remainder of his natural life, the brave old man would not have hesitated for a moment.

Friend Hopper was deeply grieved by the unjust and inhuman custom of excluding colored people from cars and omnibuses. Once, when a woman of modest deportment, and neatly dressed, was turned out into the rain, for no other fault than having a brown complexion, he indignantly jumped out of the cars and walked home in the rain himself, though well-nigh eighty years old, and weary with the labors of the day. Sometimes colored men were ordered to stand on the platform outside the cars; and whenever he heard such orders given, he walked out and stood with them. His earnest representations to the managers did, at one time, effect a temporary change; but things soon relapsed into their former state. If New York contained ten men like Friend Hopper, this unchristian custom would soon be abolished forever.

UNCLE ZEB.

Our nearest neighbor, "Uncle Z——," as he was called, a professing Christian, whose praise was in the mouths and hearts of all who knew him, was suddenly bereft of reason, and his insanity partook of the character of the man; there was no raving, destructive mania, as though the demon of natural depravity had been let loose before his time, but a mild and harmless incoherence, like innocent childish prattle, and the engrossing topic of his thoughts was still salvation by Jesus Christ, and he was as regular in attendance on the means of grace as he had been before. But all the social meetings in the region were sure to be visited by his person and edified by his exhortations, which, if not as pertinent to the general train of others' remarks, were fully as sound and scriptural as any. But the striking feature of his remarks, which then so forcibly illumined my mind, was the reformatory nature of them, as directed to professing Christians. In this lay his forte. From the scarcity of ministers then in that region, all were called on to "exercise their gifts," and Uncle Z. always exercised his, whether called on or not; and his eloquence, when illustrating wholesale confessions, was masterly, and often apalling to individuals, as well as electric to the whole audience.

To illustrate: Brother A. gets up, and says that he would not give up his hope for the world, but finds his heart so sinful that at times he almost despairs of getting to heaven; he trusts the brethern will pray for him, and try to forgive him. The moment he sits down, Uncle Z., hitherto undiscovered, is on his feet, exhorting the brother "not to give up his hope, but to keep it as an anchor, and to go right off and tell poor brother J. that he is sorry he did not pay him that bushel of corn for the last day's work, according to agreement, and that he is willing to restore to him four-fold, and will never cheat him or anybody else again as long as he lives. He that confesseth and forsaketh his sins shall obtain mercy—Amen! Brethren, let us pray for brother A.;" and a short prayer is made in perfect accordance with the facts in the case, during which Uncle Z.'s mind is refreshed with other incidents of brother A.'s life, which are all borne to a throne of grace, in simple, fervent, and touching intercession for mercy, taking it for granted that brother A. is really penitent. What poor A. feels can better be imagined than described. I think he did not go to confession again till he was somewhat posted up on particulars. Next brother B. rises, and laments a want of conformity to the character of his blessed Master, but hopes that when Christ shall appear, he shall be like him, &c. The brethern were not asked to pray for him, but Uncle Z. is very glad that as brother B. has discovered that the Saviour of mankind was not addicted to trading colts, or to going by a prayer-meeting to attend a caucus, his conformity will now more rapidly approach the great pattern. Amen!

These illustrations, from their truthfulness and simplicity, produced marked results. Some felt like shouting and clapping at the exactness of the pictures drawn, but could not say that they might not look as bad, if sketched by the same hand; others dared not stir, for fear their turn would come next. The subjects themselves might have evaded or concealed the thrusts under a fit of anger, but all knew that Uncle Z. was crazy, and a man must be a fool to be angry at him; besides, he had cut so like a skillful and compassionate surgeon, the tears often trickling down his face while he was thrusting the knife into the sorest part of the wound! And then, who had a better right than Uncle Z. to administer reproof, even if he had not been crazy? for no one could ever have said to him, "Physician, heal thyself." Hence great good seemed to be the result.

THE SCRIPTURES AMONG PAPISTS.

The marine agent of the New York Bible Society, in his report for 1851, makes the following statements respecting the deplorable ignorance of the Scriptures in the Roman Catholic countries of Southern Europe:—

"Upon vessels from the Catholic countries of Southern Europe, I find many who have never seen the Bible, and who suppose it to be the mass-book, or the small volume of Scripture stories, which, under the name of the Bible of Royaumont, and similar deceptive titles, is used in schools in some parts of Italy and France, and which the masses are encouraged by their priests to believe to be the whole and veritable Sacred Scriptures. A pleasant instance of the correction of this error, occurred on board the Italian brig —— from Genoa. Upon showing my Italian Bibles and Testaments, one sailor approached with an appearance of great interest to examine them, and then ran below to his chest, and returned with a tract which had been given him the Sunday previous. Showing a passage in it, where the composition of the Bible, its books, its translations, and its counterfeits, are spoken of at some length, he asked pointedly, 'Are these books which you offer here, the true Bible described in this little book?' On my answering that it was, he repeated the question for the sake of certainty, and then purchased two copies. On further conversation with this man, I found that he had a shrewed notion of the priests' reason for wishing to exclude the Bible, illustrating it by the expressive gesture of placing his fingers upon his closed eyes. He showed to me the book he had till then supposed to be the genuine Word of God—an old volume, ornamented with wood cuts, entitled the 'History of the Old and New Testaments,' and containing not as much matter as the New Testament alone. As is always my custom with these vessels from Catholic countries, I presented to the brig a Bible, with her name lettered on the cover; and received in return many assurances that it would be carefully kept on board, as part of the cabin furniture."

A DARK PROVIDENCE.

The account of the starvation of a company of Missionaries sent out by the "Patagonian Missionary Society" to the neighborhood of Cape Horn, which was copied in our last paper, will call forth a variety of opinions as to the wisdom of missionary operations in general; and, no doubt, we shall hear a great deal about the folly of religious enterpises which jeopardize human life, even from those who never had a word to say against expeditions to California in quest of gold, notwithstanding the numbers that have perished in such expeditions; nor a word to say against hazardous voyages to the climes of pestilence and death, in pursuit of the commodities which make the adventurers rich. In the estimation of the world, it makes a mighty difference whether life is lost in pursuit of God's glory, or in pursuit of self-interest. In the one case, the world has no other language but that of reprehension; in the other, that of laudation, for "men will praise thee, when thou doest well to thyself." So it has always been, and so it will continue to be.

In our opinion, however, these very views of worldly-minded men constitute one of the strongest arguments in justification of the missionary enterprise. The very fact that they entertain such views, is a confirmation of the great Scripture doctrine, that "the carnal mind is enmity against God." For if they cannot witness those instances of devotion to God which put life in peril, without expressing their contempt, while hazardous enterprises in pursuit of wealth, or of human glory, call forth their warmest admiration, it is proof positive that God is the object of their strong aversion. We suppose that the views which they express are the spontaneous outburst of natural feeling, and as human nature is radically the same, the world over, we conclude that such enmity against God exists every where. If it exists every where, then the gospel ought to be preached every where, and missionary operations, so far from being foolish, are the wisest undertakings ever attempted by man. We add, that among the most needy, though, perhaps, the most hopeless objects of missionary effort, are these very complainers, who so unwittingly pass sentence upon themselves as the enemies of God.

Another thing should be taken into consideration. Why was it that Patagonia, though inhabited by human beings, was found by another company of human beings, landing there with the most benevolent intentions, to be the land of desolation and cruelty, so that they were hunted backwards and forwards by the natives, and at last had to die literally by starvation? Does not such a land need the meliorating influences of the gospel? Would it be the land of cruelty, were it not for that very depravity which is the true foundation of missionary labor? Would it be the land of desolation, if the inhabitants were not fallen creatures? Were they a race of people not standing in perishing need of the gospel, they would have subdued and cultivated the portion of earth which God had given them, and obviated all necessity for the starvation of those who sought their shores. Were they not a people alienated from God, and consequently foes of man, they would not have treated with neglect, and perhaps with downright cruelty, those who came to them on an errand of love. We would add, that among whatever people is found that savage ferocity which renders it hazardous for the stranger to appear among them, there is the greatest call for missionary effort. Such people, above all others, need that gospel which teaches man to love his neighbor as himself. Worldly wisdom would wait, till what is called civilization had experimented awhile. But we consider such wisdom little better than the philosophy of the woman, who would not allow her son to go into the water, till he had learned to swim. The gospel is the only civilizer of fallen man.

The old objection, that there are heathen enough at home, without going to Patagonia, or any other far off land, in search of them, will no doubt be trumped up anew. We suppose, too, that there were sinners enough in Judea, when our Lord told his disciples to go into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature. Nevertheless, our Lord did not see fit to confine the gospel to such narrow precincts. "The field is the world;" and if the grain is ripest in the most remote borders of the field, thither let the reapers go. If they stand still till that in their immediate vicinity ripens, that which is far off will fall, and be lost. Depend upon it, divine wisdom is best in this matter. One of the greatest evils of sin is the disruption which it has made of the families of mankind. It has sundred them in feelings and in interests, and they stand aloof from each other. It seems to be in accordance with divine wisdom, to bind together the distant families of the earth by ties more infrangible and lasting than those which are founded in their earthly interests merely. Hence the injunction to give them that gospel, which cements souls together in love. People may talk of steamships, and railroads, and the thousand facilities of modern invention, as the great ligaments which bind distant regions together; but we regard such things merely as instrumentalities provided for extending the only true bond of union, the gospel of peace.

Sunday Work of Printers.—In the National Convention of Printers, held lately at Cincinnati, the subject of Sunday work came up. Mr. Rogers, a delegate from New York City, stated that he had often stood at his case all Sunday afternoon, setting upon a sermon that was delivered in the morning, from the manuscript of the clergyman himself! In one instance, he said, the manuscript was fresh from the pulpit, the subject of which was, "The strict observance of the Sabbath day!"

SABBATIZING IN HAYTI.

A correspondent calls our attention to the fact (which he learns from a letter in the N. Y. Tribune) that Rev. Mr. Judd, the Baptist Free Missionary in Hayti, attended the Coronation of the Emperor Soulouque on Sunday, April 18th; and inquires whether such a course is consistent with sabbatizing on Sunday; and, if not, whether the Free Mission Society will be under the necessity of calling Mr. J. to account for secularizing the day? Remembering the course of that Society towards Mr. Jones, whom they dismissed for keeping the seventh day and teaching the obligation of others to keep it, we should say that consistency would require them to call Mr. Judd to account. But we long ago ceased to expect consisteney in such cases. We have found that men who cannot get along at all with a consistent observer of the Bible Sabbath, can very cordially fellowship those who openly profess the most conflicting and destructive theories in regard to the sabbatic institution, such as no-Sabbath, every day a Sabbath, a seventh part of time the Sabbath, and a divinely-authorized change of the Sabbath. And perhaps, after all, this is not much to be wondered at. The advocates of these various theories stand upon common ground—they all reject the plain teachings of the word of God—and hence they have little to fear from the reproofs of each other. But when one embraces the Bible Sabbath, and begins to tell them, in the language of Scripture, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work," straightway their indignation waxes hot, and they take steps to remove this troubler by turning him out of the synagogue.

Ecclesiastical Questions in England—Popery.

Glasgow, May 21, 1852.

In the British Parliament, this week, there has been more than the usual proportion of ecclesiastical questions under discussion. The Popish Maynooth College Grant, the appointment of the semi-popish Mr. Bennett to Frome, and the Colonial Bishops' Bill, have all excited considerable interest. This last measure seemed designed and fitted to give to the Episcopal Church in our Colonies power to exercise a rather dangerous domination, being promoted by the Tractarian party. It was virtually, though not formally, rejected.

The Maynooth Grant is exciting throughout the country much interest, and the prospect of an immediate dissolution of Parliament makes many members cautious how they speak and vote, lest their constituents prove offended. The Government itself is shy of expressing a decided opinion, and although they did not oppose Mr. Spooner's motion for inquiry, it is believed that they influenced their adherents to absent themselves when the motion should have been further discussed, and by the thinness of the attendance, the House of Commons had to be adjourned. And now, in consequence of an accident which Mr. S. has sustained, Mr. Newdegate two days ago gave notice of the continuance of the motion for June 16th, and it is not expected that the state of business, should Parliament be still sitting, will admit of its being farther considered. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has intimated that Government has no intention of proposing the abrogation of the Grant. Never were men more mistaken, however, than were those who hoped that by conferring favors on Popery, they would secure the assistance of the priesthood for good government to Ireland. A spirit of fierce intolerance is nourished there, and crime is promoted to prevent inquiry. The priesthood denounce from the altar those who refuse to submit to them, and their flocks seem to understand that this is a signal for vengeance upon those who have made themselves thus obnoxious. Another determined attempt of this nature has taken place in Tuam. A man of the name of Boheus had received some Protestant laborers into his house as lodgers. He had been remonstrated with by a priest and others for this heinous offense. Disregarding the injunction to turn them adrift, his house has been twice set on fire within two weeks. On the first occasion, it was observed in flames by a person returning from a wedding. Fifteen individuals were sleeping in the house at the time.

There is much reason to fear that our present ministry are as little disposed to give any effective discouragement to the Papacy as their predecessors, but we hope they will not prove worse. It occasioned not a little surprise to many, who had read Lord John Russell's famous letter to the Bishop of Durham against Popish mummeries, to hear him lately confess, in the House of Commons, that during the Lord Lieutenancy of Lord Besborough in Ireland, the late Popish Archbishop Murray had been offered a seat in the Privy Council of the Irish Government, and that Lord John Russell regrets that the offer was declined. There is, however, undoubtedly, considerable inquiry being stirred up in the ranks of the Papacy in that benighted land, and continued accessions are being made to the number of converts to Protestantism. Among these the Rev. Richard Wall of Siskenan has sent his resignation to the Bishop, with scriptural reasons for doing so. But a correspondent of the Christian Times gives a copy of a prayer, not to God, but to "St. Gregory," for "the conversion of England," placed in a frame in the church at Rome bearing that saint's name.

The case of the Rev. Mr. Bennett, so notorious for his Popish mummeries in the London Episcopal church of St. Barnabas, continues to excite the public mind. We have already noticed his more recent admission to the vicarage of Frome although he had been dismissed by the Bishop of London. He had made no acknowledgment of error, and indeed is said to be re-acting his St. Barnabas' histrionics. In the House of Commons, on the 19th ult., Mr. Horsman (the scourge of Bishops) moved for an address to Her Majesty to take into consideration that appointment. The motion was negatived, it being stated that Government intended to examine the case. On the 27th ult. Col Boyle, in the House of Commons, stated that he found it stated in Barnstaple's "Roman Catholic Register," that on a certain day the Rev. Mr. Bennett was received into the Roman Catholic church, and he wished to know what steps Government were taking in the case. The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that the matter was under the consideration of the law officers of the Crown; but only on Monday last, he intimated that they considered that the Queen has not the means of insuring an efficient inquiry by means of a commission, and reccommending that the matter be brought before the Bishop. That this would be the merest mockery, is evident. What redress could be expected by this means? It was "with conscience of the idol," that the Bishop did the deed, and compulsion, moral or physical alone, will induce him to question the wisdom or propriety of the step. But it is not probable that Horsman will allow the matter to pass without further effort at the redress of so flagrant an evil. It was confidently stated, long ago, by proper witnesses, that during some nine months Mr. Bennett spent recently on the Continent, he was never seen in a Protestant place of worship, but regularly in Catholic chapels. A papist, not in heart only, but in practice, he seems to be.

BAPTIST FOREIGN MISSIONS.

The American Baptist Missionary Union held its Anniversary at Pittsburg, Pa., on the 18th, 19th, and 20th of May. The Report of the Executive Committee, presented on that occasion, states that the number of missions prosecuted under the direction of the Board, not including one at Ava, is 18, embracing 83 stations and 114 out-stations, besides 350 places of stated preaching in Germany and France. Connected with the missions are 57 missionaries, of whom 52 are preachers, and there are 59 female assistants. Two missionaries and two female assistants have died, and two female assistants have joined the missions. The number of native preachers and assistants is 197; total of missionaries and assistants connected with the missions, 313. Ten missionaries and female assistants are under appointment. There are 180 churches, having a membership of 13,733, of whom were added by baptism the past year, 1,280. The number of schools is 79, including 4 for native preachers, 1 normal and 16 boarding schools with about 1,700 pupils.

The receipts of the Union during the year ending with March were $124,211 94, and the expenditures, $124,558 09. Of the receipts $11,500 were grants from the American and Foreign Bible Society, $4,000 from the American Tract Society, and $4,000 from the United States Government. The whole expenditure was $5,684 51 more than in the preceding year.

Within the past year appointments have been given to Rev. Messrs. Moses H. Bixby, late pastor of the Baptist church at Johnson, Vt., and John L. Douglass, late pastor of the Baptist church at Fort Ann, N. Y., with their wives, and to Messrs. Charles Hibbard, Daniel Whittaker, John R. Nisbet, and Henry B. Shermer, of the Senior Class of the Rochester Theological Seminary, and to Messrs. Thomas Allen and A. Taylor Rose, of the Senior Theological Class of Madison University.

The Report also stated that the Memoir of Dr. Judson is in the course of preparation by Dr. Wayland, and seasonable arrangements will be made for its publication in this country and in England.

THE BEST PRESERVATIVE.

At the anniversary of the British Foreign Missionary Society, held in London last month, a prominent topic of discussion was the way of supplying churches in heathen lands with preachers, and preserving the converts from relapsing into heathenism. Dr. Tieman, Secretary of the London Missionary Society, was one of the speakers, and is reported as having spoken in the following strain:—

"If we wished to preserve the native converts from error, the Scriptures were the only certain preservative. If we wished to arm them against dangers, they were the best means of defense. He would mention one or two circumstances in illustration of this. In Tahiti the society had sustained most bitter opposition and cruel oppression. The French landed with their guns, with their brandy, with their Sisters of Charity, and with their Jesuit missionaries; but the evangelical laborers had left behind them the Bible, and under the influence of that book the converts remained steadfast, not one of them having been seduced by the sophistries of the new comers. (Applause.) Madagascar had been a scene of trial and affliction. For the first seven years of the mission, the King of Madagascar was friendly to it, not for its religious character, but for its civilizing and elavating power; but he was cut off by death, the victim of his own vices. During these seven years of royal patronage the missionaries numbered seventy converts, as they believed. Then came four years of persecution, in which the monster who now filled the throne did all she could to undo what her predecessor had encouraged. The shepherds were all sent out of the island, and the poor lambs were left in the midst of the wolves; but notwithstanding this persecution, the number of converts increased from 70 to 200. These unbefriended converts were to be left to the force of their own principles, and to the protecting power of God; and after twelve years of persecution, they increased in number from 200 to more than 2,000 (applause)—and though they had forty or fifty martyrs, there had not been one apostate."

"TIDINGS FROM JERUSALEM."

Extract from a letter of Mrs. C. A. Minor to Mrs. T. B. Stillman of New York.

Artoss, near Jerusalem, April 25, 1852.

About two weeks since I received your kind letter through the politeness of Dr. Robinson, which was indeed a welcome visitor to our little household in this strange land, to greet us so soon after our arrival. May the Lord greatly reward and bless you for your labor and care and generosity to us. Also, this week, the fifty dollars from you, sent by Bro. Boyd through England, arrived safely in Jerusalem. How can I express to you the gratitude we feel for this timely relief? We found Mr. Meshullam greatly reduced in means, from his almost unlimited benevolence last year. Many poor Jews with their families coming and going to Artoss, and each suffering for bread, he supplies them with a little wheat, a few ears of green corn, some vegetables, &c. It is a new thing for them to venture into the country, being always before subject to be stoned, and in danger of their life, without a guard. But now Mr. M. is so generally known and loved by the Arabs, that they are safe under the name of visiting him. As it is not the fruit season, and his wheat and corn, and most of his vegetables, are exhausted, we are obliged to purchase every article of food at a dear rate, until the seeds which we immediately planted shall produce bread for us. Already our corn and potatoes are up, and beans, and peas, and sweet potatoes, and tomatoes also, above the ground. Oh, pray with us, that God may give the increase, not only for our LIFE, but for the poor who will share with us; for M. says, that while he has an ear of corn, (a new thing here, from our American seed, which they greatly prize as bread,) a potato, or a piastre, he dare not refuse these miserable and destitute people. We have had many affecting appeals to come and labor with us for scarcely more than their simple bread literally, but we cannot receive them, only the few that are engaged, and the visitors, who carry back a good report of Christ to the rest in Jerusalem, because we have scarcely, with the greatest economy, sufficient to provide for the present wants of our own food and carrying on the farm.

Mr. M. has a large supply of land in possession and lease, for our united use, which is a great beginning; but he needs a pair of stout mules to plough with, for want of which, we cannot use our good ploughs, but with hired animals, at great expense; and therefore much of the soil is half prepared or dug by hand. Our only fuel, also, is charcoal, brought by wild Arabs from a great distance, at the enormous price of the same, as one dollar a barrel, so that we use as little fuel as possible, but still it is a great expense.

Mr. M. proposes, and we have united, that we all, with one heart and one soul, agree to labor together, to eat at one table, have one purse and interest, first for our economical food and the simplest necessary clothing, and all the rest, without any thought of to-morrow, given to the good of the cause, for Israel, for the poor! How can he do more? The opportunity is great indeed, and every prospect encouraging; but the labor is so great, that my heart trembles, and almost faints, when I consider our poverty. My only hope is God. My only rest or comfort for one moment, is struggling, agonizing prayer, that the Lord will not permit us to PERISH in such a cause. We are all at work, early and late, as there is much to do. Our health is still preserved, except Albert has had one slight attack of fever, quite ill for a week, from overdoing in the sun; he is now about again. He never felt so much his infirmity, as he has such a desire to work beyond his strength, seeing the need. We are in the hands of God, and begin to learn more of FAITH, and how to pray, 'Give us this day our daily bread.'

I received the little note of your friend, Mr. Wm. M. Jones, with yours, inquiring as to our worship and the Sabbath. In answer I would say, that we still confess the Sabbath to small and great, and strive to keep it sacred unto the Lord. We abstain from labor, put on our clean apparel, and meet and unite in prayer and praise, and reading the Scriptures. Our coming and position with Mr. Meshullam, as Americans, belonging to no sect, has excited much inquiry, jealousy, and criticism, by the mission establishment in Jerusalem, which is richly endowed from England, having a bishop, and some ten or twelve ministers, great and small, a hospital, its dispensary, doctors, and a British consul. These have all united, since our first visit, to induce Mr. Meshullam, to place his labors under their care and support; but though he has constantly served them in many ways, and is a member of their church, and strives to live in peace with them, yet he never would consent to their kindest and most advantageous offers, choosing rather to be FREE and poor, and to wait for us, to whom his mind more cordially seemed to run. You can then judge how prejudiced they were that he should choose Americans rather than his own people. Letters have come from England inquiring about us, and their ministers have been out to see what we were, so as to report. They first insisted upon coming out to the valley and setting up service every Sunday, even against Mr. M.'s excuse, that we were unsettled and had no room; so, on Seventh-day afternoon, one clergyman came, and as M. and we have regular family worship, he united, very much pleased with us, reading several chapters (as is Mr. M.'s delight) of the promises to Israel, while M. followed with his Hebrew Bible, his regular practice. Next morning we all appeared in our common attire, and each went to his several labor, speaking kindly to him of our conscientious duty and faith in the Sabbath. He read his lesson about 11 o'clock, and early next morning left us, and has not since repeated his effort. Yesterday, the Sabbath, the first clergyman here, the chaplain of the Bishop, came with two others, informing M. that the former had not been pleased with us, but that for his part he could not blame us for our faith. He engaged in conversation with us, and expressed great pleasure that we were so different from what he expected, and begged to unite with us in prayer and reading the Scriptures in the afternoon; to which we consented, and he went away begging that he might at least come out and pray with us every other seventh day, saying to M., apart, that now he could write with better satisfaction to England, as they had supposed we were some strange sect, like the Mormons doubtless. So, dear sister, tell Bro. Jones, that though we are very poor and weak, yet the keeping of the Sabbath remains unto us, and beg him to pray for us, and for the peace and sanctification of Jerusalem.

Our little valley is very beautiful, and sometimes, near sunset, with Albert and M., and some of the others, we walk up along the terraces beside the mountains, and view the cultivated plats, every where irrigated by the fountains that spring from the rock on the side of one mountain. Its volume has doubled in the last five years, and now forms a stream sufficient to turn a small mill. O that we were able to build the rudest sort, as the mill we sent has entirely failed, and we are obliged to pay a large price for the poor grinding by hand stones. There are many ancient ruins on one side, where a little tribe of Arabs now reside, (none dared to reside here till M. built and came,) nineteen in all, whose ancestors were owners of the valley, but they were murderers and thieves; and M. has called them back from the desert and half civilized them, and they say that if he gives up Artoss and leaves, they will cut down every tree, and flee again from the tyranny of the Turks. M. has only a small piece at the lower end of the valley, and the mountains each side of it, entirely bought; but he has quite a claim on other parts for money furnished them from time to time. They are greatly attached to him, and call him their Shiek or Father, and often come and beg him to buy the rest of the valley. This is very desirable, for they would still remain in his employ, and be protected from the great oppressions of the government. Also, the last year M. has been much annoyed by different interested parties seeking to get it from him. The Catholics want the valley, and the Greek Church have made several efforts—even one, a millionaire, from Constantinople, was so determined that he took possession of a field at the upper end, and planted trees, &c., but soon after came and begged M.'s pardon, saying he had received a command from the Sultan to leave the place, and let M. alone! M. had not complained, though his enemy supposed that he had, for, as M. often says, I trust only in God. Last week a worldly Englishman came, and would stay day after day, and began to plot with the Arabs to buy their part, and went away threatening to get it from Government. There are many beautiful enclosures on the terraces and in the flats, all green with fruit trees, many figs and pears and peaches and pomegranates. After the Englishman left, Albert and I walked out with M. among the most beautiful groves above the fountain, and I asked M. (after he had been telling A. what a great price all this load of fruit would bring in Jerusalem, if carefully picked, and the Arabs had mules to carry it, eight miles, and how many hundred piastres such and such a tree brought, selling the fruit as it stood) how much would buy all the valley, and secure it permanently? He answered, Many want it; the English Consul in Jerusalem and others; but I would never buy it, except I well rewarded these poor people; and I know they wish me to have it, and that I could get it secured from the Sultan cheaper than any one else; five or six hundred pounds at most would cover the whole! Oh, I thought, if some dear lover of the Sabbath would buy and keep it for the use of the poor Jews, and those who labor for them, so that the Sabbath could have a sure footing here, how happy it would be! Many Americans have been in Jerusalem this spring. One, a Baptist Professor (Hackett) from near Boston, came out to see us, and remained two nights. He went away much pleased and affected with our plan and position, although he had never before thought seriously of a literal fulfillment of the promises to the land.

Rothschild and the Israelites.—A Paris correspondent of the N. Y. Evangelist gives currency to the following rumor from Constantinople, the truth of which, however, he declines to guaranty:—

"Syria has been ceded to M. Rothschild for 500 millions of francs. It is not yet known whether he assumes the title of King or Pacha; it is certain that he proposes to rebuild Jerusalem and the Temple of Solomon; there are to be chapels for all religions, a line of steamers from Beyrout to Marseilles, and a railway from Alexandria to Constantinople. The new states of M. Rothschild abound in iron ore and forests of valuable timber. It is said that M. Rothschild will appeal to his co-religionists to return to the land of their fathers, to possess the tents of Abraham and Jacob."

Dr. Williams on the Bible Union.—William R. Williams, D. D., is pastor of the Baptist Church in Amity-street, New York. Several months ago, the agent of the American Bible Union (the new-version Society,) applied to that church for a collection; and in answer to the application, Dr. Williams, at the request of the church, prepared a long and labored letter, which has been printed in full by many of the Baptist papers. The following is its concluding paragraph:—

"Thus differing from you as to the merits of our existing version and the need of a revision; not agreed with you as to the best mode of making such revision were it now required; and, above all, distrusting the alliances with which your enterprise is entangled, we say it not in regard to expediency, but as a needed act of allegiance to the truth, that we can give to the enterprise, as your publications and agents have presented and shaped it, neither sympathy, confidence, nor aid."

The Methodist General Conference.—The Methodist Episcopal General Conference at Boston adjourned June 1, after a session of twenty-seven days, to meet again at Indianapolis, in May, 1856. The long-contested question concerning pewed churches has been definitely settled, so that it is now at the option of a majority of any and every congregation to decide as to whether the pew system or the free-seat system shall prevail in their respective churches, and whether the sexes shall sit apart or not. No change has been made in the regulations concerning the presiding eldership, and the various petitions for the authorization of lay delegations in the several quarterly and annual conferences have met with a negative response. Four new bishops have been elected, two from the East and two from the West, one of whom takes the place of Bishop Hamline, resigned on account of ill health, and another of the late Bishop Hedding. The bishops are now seven in number. A "Seal of the Episcopacy" has been ordered, to be used in common by all, instead of each having a separate official seal as heretofore. The "Tract Society of the M. E. Church," centering at New York, and the Sabbath School Society, have each been re-organized on an independent basis, with a view to greater efficiency. With the same intent, alterations have been made in the constitution of the missionary organization. Resolutions were passed requiring pastors to catechize children in Sabbath-schools and at special meetings; giving all male Sabbath-school Superintendents, who are church members, seats in the quarterly conferences by virtue of their office; and providing for the publication, at New York, of a new edition of the Discipline.

Methodist Missions.—A writer in the Christian Advocate & Journal says, that the people called Methodists raise annually $684,453, for foreign missions, have 900 ordained missionaries, and 8,226 assistants preaching and teaching in 32 languages, and number 165,972 church members.

"But I cannot conceal the fact, he continues, that I am mortified and pained that the M. E. Church, the largest in the great Methodist family, and one of the largest Protestant denominations in the world, is doing much less in the cause of foreign missions than most of the other great Protestant evangelical Churches of this country and of Europe. More than $500,000 of the money which the Methodists raised for foreign missions last year were raised by the English Wesleyans. The M. E. Church raised only about $55,000 for this purpose, nearly $20,000 of which were expended within the limits of the United States and Territories. The Presbyterians, and other denominations associated with them in the missionary enterprise, (all of them numbering less than the M. E. Church,) raised $337,932. The American Baptist Union raised $105,829.

Death of Dr. Samuel Nott.—The New London Chronicle records the death of the venerable Dr. Samuel Nott, on the 26th ult., at his residence in Franklin, Conn. He was in his 99th year. About a week before his decease, his gown caught fire while sitting alone in his room, and before it was extinguished his hand was badly burned. The injury and excitement consequent upon this accident, probably hastened his death. Dr. Nott had been settled in the parish more than seventy years, and was probably the oldest pastor of a parish in New England, or perhaps in the United States. The Windham County Telegraph says that Dr. Nott has for many years been an object of attention as the oldest clergyman in the State. As a man he was much beloved for his social qualities, his uprightness, manliness of deportment, obligence, perseverance, and benevolence. He was an elder brother of Eliphalet Nott, President of Union College, and gave him all his early education. He leaves behind him descendants to the fourth generation in his own family, and among the people of his parish, to whom he has ministered for 70 years. The funeral services were numerously attended on Friday, 28th, by his own people and those within a circle of twenty miles in diameter. The discourse on the occasion was delivered by Dr. McEwen, of New London. Dr. Nott has not officiated since his 94th year as pastor, the duties of that office having been performed by a colleague.

President-Making.—The National Democratic Convention to nominate candidates for President and Vice President of the United States, was held at Baltimore last week. At first the leading candidates for President were Cass, Buchanan, Douglass, and Marcy; but after three days of caucusing and balloting, the thirty-fifth ballot showed 15 votes for a new candidate, Gen. Franklin Pierce of New Hampshire, and on the forty-ninth ballot he had 282 votes out of 288; so he was declared the candidate. Gen. Pierce was repeatedly chosen to the New Hampshire Legislature, (House,) of which he was finally elected to Congress in 1833, (March,) took his seat the following December, and served through two terms, where he served from 1837 to 1842, when he resigned.

Wm. R. King, of Alabama, was nominated for the Vice Presidency, on the second ballot.

Suicide.—A most shocking case of suicide was committed by M. S. Brundage (recently of Alfred, N. Y.) in Elk Co., Penn., May 17th, 1852, by cutting his throat with a razor. Too little is known of the real cause of this awful deed, to give (as yet) any satisfactory explanation. At dinner, (about one hour before he was found dead,) on being asked if ill, he replied, "I do not feel first rate." It appears that he immediately went from dinner to his store, locked himself in, honed his razor, took a mirror up stairs and placed it on a goods box, with some goods behind it so as to give it the desired position, laid off his hat, coat, and vest, turned down his collar, and probably before the mirror severed both arteries, and laid the razor on the box before him. Mr. B. was a young man highly esteemed by all who knew him.

General Intelligence.

Proceedings in Congress last Week.

SECOND-DAY, MAY 31.

In the SENATE, after a short debate, the Deficiency bill was passed. The Senate adjourned to Thursday, in order to attend the Democratic Convention at Baltimore.

The HOUSE did nothing except arrange the adjournment from to-morrow to Sixth-day, so that the members could attend the Democratic Nominating Convention.

THIRD-DAY, JUNE 1.

The SENATE was not in session.

The HOUSE took up and referred the Deficiency bill as amended by the Senate, received a few Committee reports, and at an early hour adjourned to Sixth-day.

FOURTH-DAY, JUNE 2.

Neither HOUSE in session, both having gone to the Baltimore Convention.

FIFTH-DAY, JUNE 3.

The SENATE only was in session, and there but little was done. A petition was presented and laid on the table, from the citizens of Chemung County, New York, complaining of the inhuman, tyrannical and cruel law known as the Fugitive-Slave Law, and asking its repeal. About fifty petitions in favor of the Homestead Bill were presented.

SIXTH-DAY, JUNE 4.

In the SENATE, Mr. Seward's resolution, calling for the Hulseman correspondence, was adopted. Mr. Chase asked for the items of expense incurred in enforcing the Fugitive Slave law, but his resolution was laid over, and the Senate adjourned to Second-day.

In the HOUSE, petitions for a Mint at New York were offered; a bill for the payment to the States of the fourth installment of the Surplus Revenue was read, and, for want of a quorum, the members were obliged to adjourn.

European News.

The steamer Asia, with Liverpool dates to May 22d, arrived at New York on the 2d inst.

The Hon. G. Smythe, M. P., and Col. Romilly, M. P., exchanged shots and satisfied their honor on the 20th April. "Words spoken in debate," was the reason alledged.

Information has been received from Cape Town, that 49 bodies had been washed up from the wreck of the Birkenhead and buried. The body of Dr. Laing was recognized, having a gold watch and £18 in money upon it. Forty-seven packages of officers' clothing had also been washed ashore.

Mr. Burton, architect, proposes to construct a tower 1,000 feet high, covering one acre of ground, from the Crystal Palace materials. This would be as high as St. Peter's, St. Paul's, and the Nelson Column, piled each on the other.

It is highly probable that Lieut. M'Leod's proposal to ascend the Niger, and thence descend the Gambia, will be carried out—facilities for such a project being afforded by the recent Government contract with Mr. Macgregor Laird, for the conveyance of mails to the coast of Africa.

The Bishop of Ripon has agreed to accept from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners £4,500 for his annual income, in lieu of his present and future income; he retaining the palace and grounds, about 82 acres. The Bishop of Ely has also agreed to accept £10,646 8s. 7d. as a consideration for the transfer and relinquishment of certain lands, tithes, or hereditaments.

In the year ending 29th of September last, the number of persons relieved in Ireland as in-door was 706,278, and out-door 47,579. The total expenditure during the year was £1,141,753 1s. 4½d.

The Chester and Holyhead Company have made extensive arrangements for enabling the public, during the ensuing summer, at a cost of between £5 and £6, to make tours of a month's duration throughout Ireland.

The first Swedish railway is about to be constructed. The line adopted is that through Koping, Oreboro and Hult, which, while it will connect the two great lakes, Malaren and Wenern, will form part of a great trunk line between Stockholm and Gottenburg.

Professor Huss, the first physician in Sweden, has just published an important book on the diseases of the Swedish people. He proves that the Swedes are rapidly deteriorating, physically as to stature and strength, and morally as to intellect and virtue, a state of things which he attributes principally to the enormous use of brandy in that country.

There are now some 15,000 to 20,000 men at work on the Railroad from Alexandria to Cairo. It will be prolonged to Suez.

The remonstrance of the British consular agent, and the petition of the British residents in Rome, in favor of Edward Murray, now under sentence of death, according to the judgment recently passed by the inquisitorial tribunal of the Sacra Consulta, appear as yet to have had but little weight with the papal authorities.

The Greek Government insists upon the banishment of Dr. King from Athens, and he, in turn, strongly refuses to leave the kingdom, except on expulsion by force. The conduct of the Greek Government in his case is more than exceptionable, and is evidence of the told ingratitude of the Greeks for the favor of the people of the United States during their struggle for independence.

Escape of Meagher.

The Courier and Enquirer has the following account of the escape of Thomas Meagher, the Irish exile, who has recently arrived in New York:—

In common with his associates in exile, he enjoyed what is termed a "parol of honor," or in other words, he was permitted to move at will within a given circle, by promising not to go beyond it. For some time previous to February last, arrangements were in progress by which, if successful, the exiles, nine in number, were to be taken from Van Dieman's Land, and brought to our shores. In January the arrangements were completed, when it was found that, in consequence of their residing so far apart, (some ten miles,) it would be impracticable to get them all off at one time, and their friends, though reluctantly, were obliged to confine their operations to effecting the escape of Mr. Meagher, as his position gave the surest prospects of success. Everything being in readiness, early in February Mr. Meagher sent his parol of honor to the magistrate, with the promise that he would consider himself bound by it for two hours after its delivery, and no longer. On receiving it, the magistrate gave immediate orders to the constable in Bothwell, where Mr. Meagher resided, to arrest him without delay. This the constable refused to do, stating that he was himself an Irishman, and would do nothing to hinder Meagher's escape. This placed the magistrate in a position somewhat unpleasant, as there was not another officer within twenty-four miles. He however mounted horse and proceeded to the nearest point, for the purpose of bringing back an officer to take charge of Meagher, who waited for his return until the time had expired, after which he took horse and proceeded in an opposite direction, in which course he is said to have traveled as fast as his horse could carry him, for over one hundred miles, or to the point where his friends had another conveyance in waiting. After reaching Pernambuco, he is said to have been taken on board the brig Acorn on the 23d of April, and by her brought to this port.

Mr. Meagher is about twenty-nine years of age, and is quite corpulent. His father is estimated to be worth £700,000, and there are but three children. It is expected that a public reception will be given him in New York.

California News.

California news to May 6, (sixteen days later,) was received in New York June 2d.

From the Isthmus we have accounts of numerous robberies.

On the 22d May, the morning after the arrival of the steamship Winfield Scott at Panama, Messrs. Bours, Van Valkenburgh, Perkins and Durando, accompanied the purser, Mr. Shed, ashore in charge of a shipment of gold dust. On arriving at the mole, the boat was surrounded by a large party of natives, who endeavored to seize and carry off the gold. A violent struggle ensued, and the natives were repulsed. They then retreated to the shore, and assailed the small party in the boat with large pieces of rock. Fortunately, all escaped with light bruises, excepting Mr. Perkins of Sonora, who received a severe blow over the left ear, and fell senseless. Aid was eventually procured, and the gold landed in safety.

On the 23d of May, a trunk containing some $12,000, together with papers of value, belonging to Mr. Richmond, was stolen on the road between Panama and Cruses. There exists no probability of its being recovered; and at Frejoles on the 24th, another trunk was cut open and robbed of $5,000 and some valuable jewels.

The total shipment of gold from San Francisco for April was $3,419,817; for March, $2,549,704.

During the month of April, the number of arrivals at San Francisco, by sea, was 5,531, of whom 2,450, or nearly one-half, were from China. The increase of females within the month was 387, of children 199.

From the correspondence of the Scacramento Union, we learn that the expulsion of the Chinese gold diggers has commenced in the interior. A letter dated North Fork American River, Sunday, May 2d, says that on that morning some sixty Americans ranged down the river some four miles, driving off two hundred, quietly removing their tents, strictly respecting their persons and property, except in one instance, when a Celestial seemed inclined to be "obstreperous," his cradle was thrown into the river. The same company intended to proceed en masse to Horse Shoe Bar that afternoon, to concert measures with the miners there to "start" some four hundred located at that place. A band of music was engaged to accompany the expedition. The letter concludes thus: "There is but one opinion among the miners in regard to the proposed monopolies, and importation of Chinese into the mines, and nearly all of the eighty or ninety thousand American miners are fully determined to submit no longer to have the public lands robbed of their only treasure. A party of 35 men started from Weaverville, Trinity County, a few days ago, in pursuit of some Indians who were supposed to have murdered Mr. Anderson. The party made a descent upon a rancheadero on the south side of the South Fork of Trinity River, at midnight, and killed one hundred and forty-eight Indians, regardless of age or sex."

RAPID TRAVELING.—We learn (says the Albany Argus,) that it is in contemplation to make the 6 o'clock A. M. train from New York, which connects here with the 11 o'clock express train, a 14-hour train from New York to Buffalo. This arrangement will enable passengers to reach the latter city in time for the Central line of Lake boats for Detroit. The trip across the lake requires about 17 hours. The arrangements on the Michigan Central railroad enable passengers to reach Chicago in 12 hours—making the entire running time, when the contemplated arrangements shall take effect, from New York to Chicago, 43 hours. The distance is about 1,073 miles. The average running time by railroad and steamboat, at this rate, would be about 25 miles per hour. Two new locomotives have recently been added to the Utica and Schenectady road. The superintendent of the machine shop is confident of going the distance between Utica and Schenectady—78 miles—in 78 minutes, or one mile per minute! The drivers of the locomotives are 6½ feet. Additional locomotives of the same caliber have been placed upon the Hudson River road.

FRIGHTFUL SUICIDE.—Miss Laura Lull, a respectable American girl, of West Brookfield, Mass., committed suicide a day or two since under the following painful circumstances: Having been the victim of a cruel and heartless desertion, and laboring under a sensitiveness of disappointment and wrong inflicted upon her, she visited Worcester on the morning of the fatal day, but only to find her last hope crushed. Returning to the East Brookfield station, she left the cars, and inquiring at what time the next train would pass up towards Springfield, (which would be in a short time,) she started on foot towards West Brookfield, and disappeared beyond an adjacent curve. Very soon the train came up, and when the whistle was sounded, she snatched her purse, and taking a ring from her finger, gave them to a little girl who was walking by her side, telling her to hasten up a bank out of the way of the cars. This done, she immediately laid down upon the track, and almost in an instant was a mangled and shapeless form!

SUMMARY.

The Examiner, of Frederic, Md., announces that Miss Dix's preseverance with the Legislature of Maryland, in behalf of the Asylum for the Insane, has at length been rewarded with success. The Senate bill, appropriating $10,000 for the establishment of a State Asylum for the Insane, passed the House of Delegates on Thursday, and is now a law. According to the seventh census, the aggregate number of insane in this State is 553, of whom 447 are white; and of Idiotic 393, of whom 268 are white.

On Saturday morning, Mr. Caleb Dustin, residing in Derry, N. H., and Isaac Linerman, from Troy, Penn., arrived in this City on a boat which landed at one of the North River docks. On coming ashore they fell in with three pocket-book droppers, well known to the police, by the names of Augustus Kane, Hansen Tucker, and one Wood, alias Fowler, who managed to obtain $20 from each of the above named gentlemen by the usual dropping process.

The Cholera has appeared in Louisiana, and several cases have proved fatal, but the disease has been confined to a single plantation. It has also broken out at Cairo, on the Mississippi, where one steamer was obliged to leave twenty passengers sick with it, nine of whom had died at the last dates. Three or four citizens of the town had also fallen victims, among them being the Postmaster. The people were all leaving the place. The same disease had, at the last accounts, increased so much at the frontier town of St. Joseph, Mo., that the citizens were under apprehensions of an epidemic.

By a curious omission in the statute of Alabama, relating to marriages, it appears that marriages between whites and blacks are lawful in that State. Licenses are directed to be issued to authorize marriages "between any free persons in the State"—not any free "white" persons. The question was only raised last season, in Montgomery County, where a free negro man applied for a license to marry a white girl, and the officer, after taking counsel, was obliged to issue it. The penalties for refusal are very severe.

The Benton Standard (N. Carolina,) is credibly informed that a mine of silver ore has been discovered by Dr. Smith, in the vicinity of Gallatan, Saline County. The discovery was made by the Doctor in exploring a vein of lead, when he discovered what he took to be silver ore, and in order to be certain he sent to St. Louis for a mineralogist, who, in analyzing the ore, extracted about 15 per cent. of pure silver, and about 20 per cent. of iron and lead. The ground is of a scrubby and barren appearance.

Frederick Douglass stated in his paper, that while proceeding from Cleveland to Buffalo, on a steamboat, one of the employees of the boat undertook to turn him from the supper table, but was commanded to desist, by a stranger, who proclaimed that he was a "southerner," and secured the "colored orator" from further annoyance. He subsequently ascertained that the stranger was Mr. Marshall, a Kentuckian, Member of Congress from California.

On Friday, May 21st, in the Gulf of Mexico, at night, the ship Tennessee came into collision with the bark Fairmount, from Clentuegos bound to Philadelphia, ran over and sunk her in a few minutes. The first mate and one seaman of the Fairmount were saved, but the Captain, a lady passenger, and eight of the crew were lost. The wind was blowing hard and the night was dark, so that no assistance could be rendered.

A young Boston printer, having accumulated in California a pile big enough for two, recently returned home for a helpmate Having found one to his mind, he called on Rev. Mr. Bourne, the other day, to make him and his elect lady one, which being done to the satisfaction of the parties, the grateful gold-digger dropped into the astonished clergyman's hand a good-sized lump of the pure ore, which was found to weigh some two ounces.

At Portland, Me., on Monday, the Marshal seized, under a warrant, a 20 gallon keg, three 15 gallon kegs, and four 10 gallon kegs, containing spirituous liquors. They arrived in a schooner on Sunday afternoon. The owner is unknown; but a looker on, who happened to be present at that early hour, remarked to himself, in a melancholy tone, "There goes a hundred dollars more!"

During the past year the American Tract Society has stereotyped ninety-six new publications in English, German, French, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, Dutch and Danish, of which twenty-five are volumes. The whole number of publications now issued by the Society is 1,685, of which 352 are volumes. The total circulation during the year is 283,296,568 pages, or 8,892,973 publications, of which 967,269 are volumes.

We learn from the Jersey City Sentinel that the Common Council of that city having balloted for a President two hundred and eight times, without effecting a choice, and being thus unable to complete their organization, have unanimously resigned, and appointed the 3d of June for a new election of Aldermen by the people. This singular drawn battle was owing to a nicely balanced difference of opinion on the subject of granting licenses.

Judge Crawford, of the Criminal Court of Washington City, has rendered judgment in favor of the United States, and against Selby Parker and others, who went bail in the sum of $6,000 for Wm. L Chaplin, charged with running off slaves from the District in 1850, and also judgment against Chaplin, whose recognizance was forfeited, as he never appeared for trial.

The village of Franklin Falls, on the Saranac river, thirty miles west from Keeseville, N. Y., consisting of about twenty-five families, mostly dependent upon the working of extensive saw mills, was entirely destroyed by fire on the 29th ult., burning up all the dwelling houses, saw mills and other buildings, with a large quantity of sawed lumber, in one united conflagration.

The time and place of holding the several Conventions to nominate a President of the United States, are as follows: Democratic, Baltimore, June 1; Whig, Baltimore, June 16; Native American, Trenton, July 5; Free-Soil, Cleveland, August 4; Liberty Party, Buffalo, Sept 1.

The Dubuque (Iowa) Herald, says that the farm and village (Communist) Association, of Wabesha Prairie, Minnesota, has broken up, and the members dispersed, some returning to their old homes in New York.

We learn from the Concord (N. H.) Reporter, that four persons were drowned at Suncook village, near that place, on Saturday evening. The circumstances were as follows: Four girls, operatives in the factory, were about to cross a temporary foot-bridge over the river, which, for want of a railing, was deemed unsafe. A Mr. Bartlett being there with a boat, invited the girls to cross in his boat, into which they all stepped; when half way across, from being overloaded, or some other cause, the boat capsized, throwing them all into the water. One of the girls was rescued by a person at hand, but Mr. Bartlett and the other three girls were drowned, being in the water an hour or two before they could be got out.

At the last meeting of the French Geographical Society, where the annual prizes were awarded to those who, in the judgment of the Society, had made the most important discoveries during the past year, one of the distinctions of this kind was bestowed upon E. G. Squier, late United States Chargé to Nicaragua, in reward of his archæological discoveries, particularly those made in the last named country.

The Maine papers speak of a long continued drought in that State. The Bangor papers say that the forests are on fire to the eastward of that city, and that great damage has been done. The Hadowell Cultivator says: "The month of May has been the driest known for many years, it is said since 1806. That year hay was short and scarce. Farmers think there will be a short crop of grass this year."

About 5 P. M. on Saturday, May 29, the Female Seminary in Zanesville, Ohio, was discovered to be on fire, and so rapid was its progress, that before the alarm could be given and a force collected, the flames had burst through the roof, and in a few minutes the fire was communicated to the entire building, which was of wood and burned like tinder.

A dispatch dated Providence, June 6, 1852, says: A boat containing Mr. Merrill Wheeler, paper-hanger, and one of his workmen was capsized by a sudden squall on Saturday, and Mr. Wheeler was drowned. Another boat was also capsized by the same squall, and a colored man named Samuel Tweedy, who was alone in the boat, was also drowned.

The Cholera is stated to have appeared on the plantation of Mr. James Dalton, six miles north-west of Canton, Mississippi. Within a very few days he lost by it ten negroes. The symptoms of the disease are vomiting, purging of white serous-looking fluid, and violent cramps. These are followed by a collapsed stage, when death closes the scene in a few hours.

At the latest dates from the Sandwich Islands, there was a great excitement in Honolulu, caused by a report that the part of the garrison of the Chilian Colony in the Straits of Magellen which murdered their officers, were cruising in the Pacific as pirates in the American vessels which they had seized and plundered.

An unfortunate accident occurred on Saturday, in Salem. A son of Mr. Thomas Bateman, aged eight years, and a lad named Field, one of the crew of the brig Henrico, were amusing themselves by throwing an old scrubbing broom back and forth alternately from the wharf and the brig. The second or third time it was thrown by Field, it unfortunately struck Bateman on the back of the neck and head, and killed him almost instantly.

Dispatches from the West announce the destruction of two or three more steamers by fire, together with a large amount of very valuable freight. Since the 1st of January, over twenty steamboats on the Western rivers have been entirely destroyed by fires, explosions, sinking, &c. and the whole number of lives lost by these casualties is estimated at over two hundred and fifty.

The Rutland and Washington Railroad is now open from Rutland to Troy, and in connection with the Rutland and Burlington Road, passengers are carried through from New York to Burlington, Vt., a distance of over 300 miles, by an express train, in nine hours. Trains leave New York at 6½ o'clock in the morning, and arrive in Burlington at forty minutes past 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

It is just seven years, last week, since the line of Telegraph was completed between Washington and New York, and Professor Morse sent his first dispatch from the Federal to the Commercial Capital of the country. Since that time about fourteen thousand miles of telegraphic lines have been put up in the United States.

Eight first-class steamships left the port of N. Y. last Saturday, viz: the Great Britain, for Liverpool; Humboldt, for Havre; Crescent City for Chagres; Northern Light, for San Juan; Benjamin Franklin, for New Orleans; Roanoke, for Richmond; Union, for Charleston, and Florida for Savannah.

We learn from the Gloucester Telegraph, that two more fishing vessels of that port have been lost at sea, with their crews, consisting of fifteen men. Gloucester has suffered severely during the last eight months, in her fishing fleet, having lost eight vessels, seven of them with their crews consisting of sixty-three men!

Among the latest discoveries at Nineveh, one coffin was found containing the body of a lady of the Royal house; many of her garments were entire, also the gold studs which fastened her vest. The most singular discovery, however, was a covering of thin gold pressed upon the face, so as to assume and retain the features of the deceased.

The Council of Catholic Bishops at Baltimore have decreed that eight or ten new Bishoprics shall be added to the church in the United States, and also that the mass shall henceforth be said or sung in English. These decrees must, however, be endorsed at Rome, by the Pope, before they have any validity.

Hon. Henry Barnard, Superintendent of Common Schools in Connecticut, was thrown from his carriage on Saturday, near the Little Bridge, Hartford, his horse having become frightened and unmanageable. He was taken up insensible, and was considerably injured.

Henry S. Waldo, Esq., of Boston, has bestowed on Middlebury College the means of adorning its spacious Common with more than a thousand different trees, besides a nursery of a thousand of foreign growth, for future use.

Mr. Clay's health remains much the same as during the past fortnight, there being no change for either the better or worse.

Saturday evening, May 29, at Sancook Village, N. H., a Mr. Babcock, accompanied by four young ladies, attempted to cross the river at that place in a boat, which upset, and four of the party were drowned, viz: Mr. Babcock, two sisters named Haley, and Miss Trasher.

A Jury in Mobile, a few days since, gave a judgment against some steamboat owners, with damages assessed at $1,260, for the value of a slave, whose death was charged to have been caused by the mismanagement of the boat.

The Coroner's Jury in the case of the collision between the steamers Hannah Augusand Trausitta, on the St. Johns River, have rendered a verdict of manslaughter against the officers of both boats.

The Boonton Iron Works, N. J., were sold on Tuesday for $160,500. The Morris Jerseyman says that this sum is not one-fourth of their first cost.

A Post Office has been established at Temperance Valley (Hopkinton), R. I., called the Ashaway Post Office, Lyman Kenyon, Postmaster.

Three persons in Utica have recently been fined $50 each for re-using postage stamps. This is a pretty dear way of paying three cents.

A destructive hurricane occurred at Ipswich, Mass., on Saturday, May 29, blowing down houses, tearing up large trees, and doing other damage.

The Canal tolls at Albany for the four weeks of May are $46,737 against $45,572 in the same period of last year.

There is considerable activity in Land Warrants, and the price is $124 and $127 per 160 acres.

We learn from Lexington, Mo., that there is considerable sickness on the Plains, and some cholera.

More murders of Americans by Mexicans on the Texan frontier, are reported.

The cholera is spreading in the West. Several deaths have occurred in Cincinnati.

MARRIED,

In Berlin, N. Y., May 29th, by Rev. B. F. Summerbell, Mr. HIRAM D. HULL to Miss MARGARET A. GREENMAN, all of the above place.

In Alfred, May 29, by Eld. Jared Kenyon, Mr. HARRIS EASTMAN to Miss EMMORILLA BENJAMIN, all of Alfred.

DIED,

In Fulton, Rock Co., Wis., on the 18th of April, of a disease of the heart, BENJAMIN COLLINS, aged 63 years and 1 month. Brother Collins made a profession of religion in early life, and attached himself to the Methodist Church. About 20 years ago he embraced the Sabbath of the Bible, and became a member of the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in Alfred, N. Y. Seven years ago he removed to Wisconsin, where he set a worthy example by attaching himself at once to the church, where he remained a living witness of the truths of religion. In him was fulfilled the words of the Psalmist, "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace." O. P. H.

In Greenmanville, Ct., May 19th, of consumption, DAMARIS W. HOPKINS, aged thirty years. The deceased was the first person baptized in Greenmanville after the organization of the Seventh-day Baptist Church, and the first received into its membership, and she is the first of its members who has died. Sister Hopkins embraced religion when about 19 years of age, and has been a living example of it while she tabernacled in the flesh. Though all her friends but one observe the first day, yet she truly embraced the Sabbath. During her sickness, which was of nearly one year's duration, she exhibited patience and Christian resignation. As she neared the brink of Jordan, she was eager to pass its chilly stream; and just before she ascended the banks of deliverance she exclaimed, "Oh, why cannot I die? Come, Lord Jesus," and in a few minutes she fell asleep. S. S. G.

At Newstead, N. Y., March 16th, 1852, POLLY, wife of John Cottrell, and daughter of Dea. Elisha Stillman, in the 73d year of her age, in hope of having part in the first resurrection.

In Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., May 22, 1852, Mrs. POLLY COTTRELL, wife of Benjamin Cottrell deceased, in the 69th year of her age. Sister Cottrell in early life became a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church of Berlin, Rensselaer Co., with which she continued until she joined the Petersburg Church. Her disease was cancer, and very painful; but God gave her grace to endure it with Christian fortitude, enabling her to give the best evidence that she was a child of his. She welcomed the approach of death, and departed with joy.

In Hornellsville, N. Y., Sept. 28, 1851, MARANDA M., daughter of Weeden and Calista Witter, aged 6 months. Also, MORRIS G., son of the above parents, Jan. 6, 1852, aged 3 years, 9 months, and 22 days.

Ancient Jerusalem.

BRUNETTI'S Celebrated Model, belonging to Mr. N. Southard, is announced to open for exhibition at the spacious Hall, 283 Fulton-st., Brooklyn, on Friday, June 4th, at 3 P. M. Lectures are delivered every day and evening, at 3 and 8 P. M., by E. A. Rice. Clergymen and Sabbath School Superintendents are invited to visit it without delay, that they may judge of its worth to themselves and others. They will please give their names at the door.

People's Line of New York and Albany Steamers.

THE steamers ISAAC NEWTON, Capt. Wm. H. Peck, and HENDRIK HUDSON, Capt. A. P. St. John, forming the People's Line between New York and Albany, leaving foot of Cortland-st., New York, every evening at 6 o'clock, and Albany every evening on the arrival of the Express Train from Buffalo.

Clothing Establishment.

THE subscribers, under the firm of WM DUNN & Co., have opened a Clothing Establishment at No. 163 William-street, New York, where they intend to keep constantly on hand, in large quantities and great variety, coats, pants, and vests. Country merchants desirous of introducing ready-made clothing as a branch of their business, may here obtain a supply on the most favorable terms. Individuals who desire to renew their wardrobes on short notice, may here be fitted with complete suits without delay; or, if they prefer it, may select their cloths and leave their orders, which will receive prompt attention. An examination of our stock and facilities will, we trust, convince those who give us a call, that they can please themselves at No. 163 William-street as well as at any other place in the City of New York.

New Printing Materials.

NEW Building, No. 29 Beekman street, between Nassau and William streets, near the City Hall, Park, and principal hotels, New York. The undersigned beg respectfully to inform their patrons and the trade, that they have removed to their new building, No. 29 Beekman street, between Nassau and William streets. They trust, from the facilities there offered, by every modern improvement, to meet a continuance of liberal support. Fonts of plain Scotch faces, ranging from 100 lbs. to 1,000 lbs. weight, will be kept on hand, as well as a varied assortment of Fancy Letter, and every article necessary for the furnishing of complete printing offices. The subscribers would beg to call the attention of the trade to their metal, which, for durability, has not been surpassed, if equaled, by any foundry in the United States. By a peculiar combination of metals, arrived at from an experience of thirty years, they are enabled to cast type which they feel assured will last one-third longer than that heretofore furnished by any other foundry in the country. In proof of this, they would state, that the last dress of this paper [the New York Herald] lasted upwards of one year, averaging a daily circulation all the year, including Sundays, besides extras, of 35,000 copies; and this on their rotary cylinder presses—thus evidencing conclusively the fact of durability.

Miscellaneous.

Romance in Real Life.

A great deal of excitement has recently been created in the higher classes of the Austrian capital, by the remarkable and romantic developments of numerous heavy robberies, which for years past have been committed in and near the metropolis, by one or more malefactors, whose whereabouts it was impossible to trace out. In order to give a thorough insight into the matter, we must begin at a period when the existence of this gang was proved by their actions.

Toward the close of October, 1848, during a fine and clear autumnal night, the traveling carriage of Mr. Edward C. Brooks, a wealthy merchant of London, who then was on his way back to Vienna, from a long tour in Upper Italy and the Lombardic provinces, was stopped within three miles of Vienna, in the most populous part of the country. One man only presented himself at the coach window, and courteously, but firmly, demanded the surrender of whatever valuables the inmates of the conveyance possessed. With Mr. Brooks there were two ladies, his wife and her younger sister, the latter of whom had already drawn her purse, and was in the act of handing it to the highwayman, when her extended arm was fractured by a pistol shot from Mr. Brooks, who, having perceived the movement of his sister-in-law, had from the back of the carriage quietly taken aim at the robber, with a view of answering the impudent demand. A scene of terrific confusion then ensued. The report of the pistol brought, besides the two men who guarded the coachman and horses, three more individuals to the support of the highwayman; the traces were cut in an instant, the coachman was lashed to his seat, and the highwaymen prepared to avenge the death of their leader, who lay apparently inanimate on the ground.

The doors of the caleshe were torn open, but the spectacle which there presented itself, was such as to make the robbers pause before they launched out upon the mission of revenge. Miss Perry, the wounded lady, lay in the arms of her sister, whose speechless agony proved the horror which she felt at the occurrence. Mr. Brooks, still ignorant that it was he who inflicted the injury, had nevertheless abandoned all ideas of resistance, and was vainly endeavoring to staunch the blood, which flowed in torrents from the ghastly wound. For some minutes, the highwaymen looked upon this mournful scene, until a low moan from their leader reminded them of the necessity of giving him that attention which his condition peremptorily called for. A few minutes sufficed to prove that he was not dangerously wounded; the bullet, after fracturing the slender arm of Miss Perry, had spent itself against his chest, causing what the Germans call a Prellsehuss, and though it did not penetrate the flesh, had still force enough to break a bone or two without any other outward sign than a small black spot on the place where the leaden messenger struck.

The chief soon recovered, and was able to ride off, while he had left his followers in charge of the carriage, giving strict orders, however, not to plunder the Englishman and his family, but to give them every assistance to enable them to reach Vienna as early as possible, that the young lady might obtain medical aid. The orders were executed to the letter; Mr. Brooks saw his horses put to the carriage by his late assailants, who exhibited the most respectful bearing toward him, and seemed rather to wish him good than evil. So much indeed was he taken by the conduct of the men, that on parting he gave a diamond ring of great value to him who had been left in command by the chief, with orders to hand it over to his master, as a token of his gratitude for the consideration which had been extended to the suffering lady.

The occurrence caused an extraordinary sensation at Vienna. Apart from the boldness of the act, the standing of Mr. Brooks, and his energetic action, the result of the encounter, so far as Miss Perry was concerned, gave sufficient interest to the matter for it to remain the standing topic for many weeks. As to the injured lady, she suffered greatly from the severe wound, but recovered without the loss of her arm, which at first it seemed impossible to save. Though Mr. Brooks discountenanced all efforts to trace out the individual who stopped his carriage, the police nevertheless caused the most minute inquiries to be made, but without the slightest success.

A month or two passed quietly away, when the news of another attack on the highway, this time accompanied with a robbery to a heavy amount, startled the police from their apathy, to which they had abandoned themselves since they saw their efforts to point out the perpetrators of the previous robbery fruitless. Attack followed attack at four or six weeks interval, and they were directed only against the most wealthy, with a sagacity and prudence which defied every precaution on the part of the authorities. Years thus passed without the least success against these depredators; and, late in the fall of 1851, three robberies were committed during one night, not one of which led to a discovery, though the booty consisted of such articles as could not have been disposed of in the Austrian Empire without establishing suspicion against the seller.

In the month of January, Miss Perry, who, since receiving the wound from the pistol-shot of her brother-in-law, had been married to a Welsh gentleman named Trewyth, arrived at Vienna with her husband, where her former adventure was by no means forgotten, and was frequently spoken about in company. Among those who seemed to take the deepest interest in the matter, was a Baron Pregli, a Lombardic nobleman, who for the last ten years had stayed at Vienna, and apparently enjoyed unbounded wealth. He became an admirer of Mrs. Trewyth, and her constant attendant. Rumor was soon started, and the question was asked, why the husband allowed so close an intimacy as was exhibited in their frequent rides and walks. None, however, pretended to prognosticate the result of this intimacy.

At an early hour on the second of March, Baron Pregli's mansion was surrounded by a body of officers, the leader of whom thereupon demanded access to the building. After a while the doors were thrown open, and the commissary, with two of his men, entered, while others were left to guard the various outlets. Nearly half an hour thus passed over, until the officers returned, bringing with them and carefully guarding Baron Pregli, whom they took to the prison usually assigned to political offenders. From the action of the police, no one can tell what is the offense which he is charged with; he had no hearing, and probably may have none; his friends may see him again, or they may not, just as it suits the despotic will of him who rules over Austria.

In spite of the precautions which are always taken in Austria to keep secret the offenses of the nobility, the story in regard to Baron Pregli's career has leaked out. It appears that it is he who, in connection with several devoted servants, has for years past rendered the highway to Vienna insecure, as he could carry on these depredations from his country residence without in the slightest measure incurring the suspicions of the authorities. It is a remarkable fact, that the Baron had actually stood in the pay of the police, a situation which he probably coveted only for the purpose of leading any suspicions that might arise into another channel.

Becoming deeply enamored of the beautiful Mrs. Trewyth, he sought vainly to gain her affections, and at last, in a silly fit of despair, showed her the ring which Mr. Brooks had sent him, as the leader of the highwaymen, three years previously, and appealed to her to become his, since she had once been chosen to be the instrument to save his life. So far from this confession having the effect of softening her feelings, she became all the more prejudiced against him, but promised faithfully to keep the secret, if he would not repeat the offensive proposals. Pregli did not come near her for a week, but at last attempted to carry her off by the aid of his satelites, and being foiled in this, information was given, which led to the arrest, as before stated.

Three of the Baron's men have since been arrested, and at his country residence a large quantity of articles were found, all of which were identified as having been stolen.

"Where is the Shovel?"

"Nathan, where is the shovel? here I've been hunting long enough to do my work twice over, and can't find the shovel."

The farmer was wroth.

"I don't know where 'tis, father; summ'ers about, I suppose."

The two joined in the search.

"Nathan, you have left the shovel where you have worked, I know. Why don't you put the tools in their places?"

"Where is the place for the shovel, I should like to know, father?"

He couldn't tell. It had no place. Sometimes it was laid in the wagon, and occasionally accompanied that vehicle when harnessed in a hurry. Sometimes it was hung up with the harness, to fall down when not wanted, or to get covered up when it was. A great deal of shoe-leather had come to nought by that shovel. It had at times more than the obliviousness of Sir John Franklin, and defied discovery. So it was with all the other tools. They would seem to vanish at times, and then come to light as rusty as old anchors.

The farmer's barn was crowded. He had no "spare room" there. There were several in his dwelling. But the barn was always crammed—it was a kind of mammoth sausage—stuffed every year. So there was no room for a special apartment for the tools. In his imagination he never saw his hoes hung on a cleat, his chains all regular in a row, his rakes and his long forks overhead; certainly he was never anxious for such a convenient room.

Why?

His father never had a tool-house, and his father was called a good farmer.

So he was, then—in his day—but there are better husbandmen now, let me say, and I desire to shock no one's veneration.

Did they find the shovel? No! they might as well have searched for the philosopher's stone, seemingly. Nathan started for Mr. Goodman's to borrow one. Their work must be done, and borrow he must.

"I don't know as you can find one in my tool house," replied Mr. Goodman.

Nathan noticed that he bore down on some of his words like a man on his plow beam. Didn't he mean something? Nathan went to the tool-house thoughtfully. A wide door on wheels opened with a slight push, and there were Goodman's tools—enough, Nathan thought, to equip a company of sappers and miners? Hatchets, axes, saws, tree-scrapers, grafting tools, hoes, diggers, shovels, spades, pick-axes, crow-bars, plows, harrows, cultivators, seed-sowers, sieves, trowels, rakes, pitchforks, flails, chains, yokes, muzzles, ropes, crow-twine, baskets, measures—all were there, and compactly arranged. It was Goodman's ark—to save him from the deluge of unthrift! Here every night the tools were brought in and wiped clean and hung up in their places. The next morning a job could be commenced at once, Goodman knew. He partitioned off a large room to his new barn for tools. It was central and easy of access. It was a pleasant place for a visitor; the tools were the best of their kind. Every new shovel, or rake, or fork, before used was well oiled with linseed oil, which left the wood smooth and impervious to water. Goodman frequently says, "I had rather have the few hundred dollars I have spent for tools so invested than the same in railroad stock. It pays better."

Now there is no patent in Goodman's plan, and I hope many will go into it—the more "successful imitations" the better.

New Excursion Ground.

The Savannah Republican, of May 1, says: A party of ladies and gentlemen leave here this morning, by the Central Railroad, on a summer excursion to the great prairies of the North-west. They consist of Mr. Stephen Clay King, of Wayne County, his lady, two daughters, and three sons, and Henry Gignillat of Glynn County, and perhaps one or two English gentlemen. A member of the party passed on some time since to St. Louis, to lay in provisions and provide conveyances. From St. Louis, the excursionists will take a boat up the Missouri River, for several hundred miles, and at a convenient place disembark and strike out into the prairies which border on the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains. They will take with them a wagon, so constructed as to swing a mattress in it to sleep on—two or three light carriages, one or more saddle horses, tents, servants, and all the conveniences of cooking, sleeping, &c. They visit Fort Laramie, at the foot of the Rocky Mountains, and other posts in the far west, pass through the hunting grounds of the Pawnee, Kansas, and Ottoe Indians, and make the circuit of the broad prairies lying west of Minnesota. The party expect to return to St. Louis by the middle of October. The climate of the western prairies is represented by travelers to be exceedingly fine. The air is pure and dry, the water excellent, and the temperature delightful. Upon the high table lands east of the Rocky Mountains, dew enough does not fall at night to dampen a cambric handkerchief, and travelers very often sleep out at night, during the summer, without any covering or protection. We have seen a statement somewhere, that in consequence of the purity and dryness of the atmosphere, animal and vegetable decomposition takes place less rapidly in that region than any where else on the western continent. A son of Mr. King went over the same ground last year, with a party of gentlemen from New Orleans, and derived so much benefit from it, that his father has determined to take his family with him. All the gentlemen of the party will go amply armed to defend themselves against the Indians, should they attempt an attack, and provided with all the necessary means for hunting and fishing.

The Fire Department of London.

From an English Paper.

An American gives an explanation of the manner of extinguishing fires in London, which must be interesting to our readers, since there are there no organizations for attending the fires, as in this country.

Several insurance companies unite and provide disciplined bands of firemen, who act as leaders, for the crowd which always gathers to see a fire, are made to assist. These bands have their rendezvous at convenient places, and are always ready for any calamity.

One of these spots is a singular scene. At all hours of the day and night you will find several fire-engines well mounted upon strong cars, to which are attached two or four powerful horses. The gates are always open, the horses harnessed, and the lines in the hands of a driver. Besides the driver, there are to each team several firemen, dressed and ready for action, and there they stand ready in a second's notice to fly to the scene of conflagration. A large number of engines and horses are on hand for use, and several are constantly harnessed and manned for service. There are several depots scattered over the metropolis from which the engines start. The costume of the firemen is fine, the horses are always spirited, and the sight when they are in motion is one of life and spirit.

To insure the quick transmission of news of fires to head-quarters, the policeman who on observing a fire first gives notice at an engine station, receives a reward amounting to about $2 50, and still another reward is given to the engine which first appears on the ground.

Arrived at the scene of the fire, at once the hose of the engine is applied to the street-plug—for the water companies only obtain charters on condition of giving all the water which is needed for fires, free of cost. A suitable band of men for working the engines is soon gathered from the crowd, by offering twenty-four cents for the first hour, twelve for the next, and so on, besides a feast of bread and cheese and ale, to wind off with. Twenty or thirty men are needed to work each engine, but a fire never yet occurred in London where there was a lack of men for hire on these terms.

The trained firemen attend to all the dangerous parts of the service, and the common laborers merely work the engines. The brigade-men, as they are called, wear a compact dress, with a stiff leathern helmet to protect the head, and often make courageous and dangerous attacks upon the devouring element. If it is necessary to enter a room full of smoke and flames, a fireman with a smoke-proof dress enters at once to the rescue of the periled object. The work goes on coolly, but with wonderful dispatch; and when all is over, all parties who have worked adjourn to the nearest public house to partake of the before-hand bargained-for bread and cheese and ale.

The Fire Brigade belongs to some eighteen or twenty insurance companies, and has fifteen or sixteen stations. There are a Superintendent and Captains, and the men are promoted according to their energy and trustworthiness. We need not add, that they are paid well, and those employed who are stout, strong, and full of expertness. Here is one of the great advantages they have over the members of fire companies in American towns, who do not make it their business. They are generally persons of ordinary strength, and can never be so skillful as men who make the putting out of fires a profession.

Another Fugitive Case.

James Phillips, a colored man, who has been working peaceably and honestly for the last fourteen years at Harrisburg, Pa., where he has a wife and children, was seized on the 24th ult. as a fugitive slave, while at his regular work of driving team for the Railroad Company, hurried before Commissioner R. McAllister, where, on the strength of testimony that would not have proved title to a dog, he was adjudged a slave. The American Standard thus closes its account of this business:—

Mr. McKinney then addressed the Commissioner on the illegality of some of the testimony given, the indefiniteness and insufficiency of the evidence as to the ownership by the claimant and the alleged escape, and the want of proof to justify an order of removal.

The Commissioner, however, drew out the papers, already drawn up, and filled in the name of James Phillips. Mr. Rawn called the attention of the Commissioner to such a singular way of doing business; to which he replied, that if he waited until the hearing of the case, he would have to stay up all night to make them out, &c. The alleged fugitive was then handed over to the custody of the officers, and immediately conveyed directly across the street into Dauphin County Jail. The entire street was filled with citizens of both sexes, and when Phillips' wife saw him dragged into the prison door, she gave vent to her feelings in the most agonizing screams, which rent the air as she was conveyed to her desolate home. Fathers and mothers of families who had never witnessed the practical workings of the infamous slave law, now openly denounced it, and an entire revolution in public sentiment displayed itself throughout the borough.

In the morning, at 6 o'clock Phillips was taken in the cars to Baltimore, and at 4 in the afternoon to Virginia. So great was the feeling manifested, that an agent was dispatched to Baltimore to ascertain the price set on Phillips, and purchase his freedom, to which the citizens very generously and very liberally contributed.

The Crystal Palace.

The London Times says of the Crystal Palace: Among our advertisements this day will be found the first announcement of the Crystal Palace Company. The scheme for the removal of this enormous building to an appropriate site in the immediate neighborhood of the Metropolis, will there be found explained at length. Sydenham, a station on the Brighton Railway, has been fixed upon as the spot on which the Crystal Palace is once more to display its graceful proportions. It is to be placed in the midst of a park of 150 acres, which is to be planted with specimens of every tree which can be grown out of doors in England. The Palace itself is to contain a winter garden of 18 acres in extent, filled with the choicest plants and flowers.

Within its walls flower-shows are to be held, which will put to shame the exhibition of Chiswick on the Regent's Park. There are to be sculptures by the chief living artists, and casts of the most celebrated works of antiquity. Geology and mineralogy will receive their appropriate illustrations, while specimens of the most striking costumes and manufactures of the various nations will be laid out as at the time of the Great Exhibition. Not the least interesting part of this splendid spectacle will consist of samples of machinery, such as those which were seen at work last year in the northern section of the building, when it stood in its full glory in Hyde Park.

In a word, as far as it may be possible, no effort will be spared to make the Crystal Palace what it was last year, and something more besides. The building itself will show to much greater advantage when place in the midst of a large space, filled with shrubs and trees, than on its old site in Hyde Park, where the immediate proximity of the Kensington houses spoiled the effect, as seen from the south. Nor, as far as the arrangements for passing to and fro are concerned, will there be much reason for regret. The situation in which the building is to be placed is as easy of approach for the greater proportion of the inhabitants of London as the former site.

The Victims of Intemperance.

Hon. Edward A. Hannegan recently killed his brother-in-law at Covington, Indiana, under the influence of liquor. Mr. Hannegan had been a member of the Legislature, both Houses of Congress, Ambassador to Prussia, and might have been honored and useful in every relation of life, but for his fearful devotion to the glass, which has long rendered him a terror and disgrace to his friends, and has at length probably led him to a felon's doom. John Wentworth, who served with him in Congress, thus comments on his case in the Chicago Democrat:—

Every man who has seen Mr. Hannegan when under the influence of liquor, as we have, can believe the above. And every one who has seen him and lived at the same house with him and his family, as we have, when he has been a total abstinence man for months together, will indeed pity him. When sober, he is as pure, as upright, as kind, and as generous a man as there is in this country. With him, there can be no middle state. He is a brute when drunk. When sober, he will compare in all the elements of goodness with any man living. But he cannot drink without getting drunk.

Mr. Hannegan entered the lower House of Congress many years ago, a perfectly temperate man; and, in point of talents, integrity, and popularity, his pospects were as flattering of those of any young man in the United States. But Washington fashions and habits were too much for him. Dissipation drove him to private life. He reformed, became a temperance lecturer, and an exemplary member of the Church. His exhortations in times of great revivals are said to have equaled those of the most eloquent divines living. At length his old habits were forgotten, and he was sent to the Senate. He took his seat an exemplary son of Temperance and a Christian. But, again, the temptations were too great for him. His struggles with himself were gigantic, and the assistance of one of nature's noblest of women, his wife, secured for him the sympathies of everybody. But he would have his sprees, and he lost his re-election. Like most politicians, he left office miserably poor. At the close of his term, and of Mr. Polk's administration, to keep so popular and so good a man from despair and ruin, although it came out of General Taylor's term, the Senators unanimously, Whigs and Democrats, signed a call for Mr. Polk to send him to Russia, and he was appointed to that mission. His unfortunate career there is well known. Since his return, we have heard nothing of him until this melancholy affair.

We have seen many a young man enter Congress perfectly temperate, and leaving it totally ruined; but we never knew one who had so many efforts to save him, so ineffectually, as Mr. Hannegan. We now have in our mind three in our own term who killed themselves. Mr. Hannegan has tried to do so several times; but he lived to kill his wife's brother, the best friend, save his wife, he had in the world. That he wishes he was in poor Duncan's place, we have no doubt. What an awful comment this is upon the evil effects of intemperance! It was the first drop that ruined Hannegan. He is now about the middle age of man, and may yet live to be a very useful man; but there is a greater probability that he will commit suicide.

This tragedy will do much toward enacting the Maine Liquor Law in Indiana, and we can almost predict that it will be enacted at the next session of the the Legislature.

Two Scotch Lawyers.

In a case in which Lord Jeffrey and Lord Cockburn, when barristers, were engaged, a question arose as to the sanity of one of the persons concerned. "Is the defendant, in your opinion, perfectly sane?" said Jeffrey, interrogating one of the witnesses, a plain, stupid-looking countryman. The witness gazed in bewilderment at the questioner, but gave no answer. It was clear that he did not understand the question. Jeffrey repeated it, altering the words, "Do you think the defendant capable of managing his own affairs?" Still in vain; the witness only stared the harder. "I ask you again," said Jeffrey, still with his clear English enunciation, "do you consider the man perfectly rational?" No answer yet; the witness only staring vacantly at the eloquent little figure of his interrogator, and exclaiming, "Eh!" "Let me tackle him," said Cockburn. Then assuming the broadest Scotch tone, and turning to the obdurate witness, "Hae ye your mull wi' ye?" "Ou ay," said the awakened Cimon, stretching out his snuff-horn. "Noo, hoo lang hae ye kent John Sampson?" said Cockburn, taking a pinch. "Ever since he was that high," was the ready reply, the witness indicating with his hand the alleged altitude of John Sampson, at the period of his first acquaintance with him. "An' d'ye think noo, atween you and me," said the barrister, in his most insinuating Scotch manner, "that there's onything intil the cratur." "I wudna lippen him wi' a bull-calf," (I would'nt trust him with the guardianship of an infant bull,) was the instant and brilliant rejoinder. The end was attained amid the convulsions of the court.

Perseverance Rewarded.

As a young peasant one day was returning to his village from Sion, a heavy fall of snow, about the beginning of October, met him on his toilsome ascent; he reached, at length, a rock from which he could see his own chalet, but in its stead nothing appeared but a frightful mass of snow-heaps, beneath which his house, his wife, and their only child, were doubtless engulfed. At first he was overwhelmed with despair, and threw himself on the rocks in a state of stupor; but presently the light of hope broke upon him—he started up, and rushed to the still uninjured cottage of one of his neighbors, whose assistance he entreated; several others joined with them, and together, armed with pickaxes and spades, they set to work with the view of disengaging the devoted family from the overwhelming wreck. It required both strength and resolution, and the friends worked till night with ardor. The young man was then left alone; he continued to labor without ceasing, and at day-break his companions returned; the second day ended without result, but despair gave the husband fresh vigor, in spite of his fearful disappointment. A third day he toiled on, and at last, to his unspeakable rapture, he discovered the roof of his dwelling, and through an aperture for the smoke he perceived his wife sitting by the light of a lamp, watching her infant, who was being at the moment suckled by a goat. His cries of joy were soon responded to, and the story of deliverance was soon told. A large rock behind the chalet had forced the avalanche which had descended to take another direction, and all beneath the roof, to the last of his flock, were saved. His resolute perseverance was rewarded, and the pair became the objects of congratulation to the whole district. When one sees the position of these villages, one is not astonished at any of these histories, which, however, have seldom so fortunate an ending as this. [Sites in the Alps.

Profits of Authorship.

Charles Dickens enjoys an income greater probably than was ever before derived from literature by an author. The first edition of "Bleak House," which comprised twenty-five thousand copies, was swept from the booksellers' counters at once. The second edition of twenty thousand copies had been nearly exhausted when the last steamer sailed. The sale may fall off in subsequent numbers, and it may increase; but we may safely compute the average sale at forty thousand numbers a month. The price is one shilling English, and it is reasonable to suppose that an author who is in a position to dictate his own terms, would hardly be satisfied with less than half the proceeds; that is at once a thousand dollars per month. Then Mr. Dickens derives, it is said, a hundred pounds per week from Household Words, and a large sum from the sale of his other writings. At a very moderate estimate, therefore, we may conjecture that his income is twenty thousand pounds, a hundred thousand dollars, a year—an income considerably greater than that of Sir Walter Scott in the height of his renown. Dickens spends freely, entertains liberally, bestows bountifully, and his good fortune has made him no enemies.

RECIPE FOR LONGEVITY.—Prof. Silliman closed a recent Smithsonian lecture in Washington, by giving the following sensible advice to young men:—If, therefore, you wish for a clear mind, strong muscles, and quiet, long life, and power prolonged into old age, permit me to say, although I am not giving a temperance lecture, avoid all drinks but water, and mild infusions of that fluid; shun tobacco and opium, and everything else that disturbs the normal state of the system; rely upon nutricious food and mild diluent drinks, of which water is the basis, and you will need nothing beyond these things except rest, and the due moral regulation of all your powers, to give you long, and happy, and useful lives, and a serene evening at the close.

CHINESE ANTIQUITIES IN IRELAND.—A paper was recently read before the Belfast Literary Society, in Ireland, on Chinese porcelain seals, which have been found in that country. About fifty have been found, some in deep bogs, one in a cave, some in one place, some in another, scattered over the country from Belfast to Cork. How they came there is a query; nobody can tell. They are of great antiquity. They have all inscriptions on them in the ancient Chinese seal language, and Mr. Gutzlaff had translated a number of them. Each seal is a perfect cube, with the figure of a Chinese monkey by way of a handle. It is supposed they may have been brought there by the ancient Phœnicians.

THE GENTLEWOMAN.—"I cannot forbear pointing out to you, my dearest child," said the lord Collingwood to his daughter, "the great advantages that will result from a temperate conduct and sweetness of manner to all people on all occasions. Never forget that you are a gentlewoman, and all your words and actions should mark you gentle. I never heard your mother, your dear good mother, say a harsh or hasty thing to any person in my life. Endeavor to imitate her."

Mr. S. S. Jennings, of Mobile, claims to be the rightful heir to the great Jennings estate, in England. He says that not a single link is wanting in his lineage, from Charles, of 1631, down to the day of his birth; that he is the oldest male lineal descendant of Charles and Mary Jennings, who came from England, and was clerk of the court of Elizabeth City, in the town of Hampton, Va., in 1631. His books are now in the Clerk's office at Hampton, at which place 143 acres of land were granted to them as emigrants from England. Mr. Jennings estimates the estate to be worth from forty to fifty millions of dollars. The real estate for the fifty-two years has yielded about $40,000 annually.
